*Crabb thus discriminates between delay, to defer, to procrastinate, to postpone, to prolong, to protract, and to retard: "Delay is simply not to commence action; to defer and postpone are to fix its commencement at a more distant period; we may delay a thing for days, hours, and minutes; we defer or postpone it for months or weeks. Delays mostly arise from faults in the person delaying; they are seldom reasonable or advantageous; deferring and postponing are discretionary acts, which are justified by the circumstances; indolent people are most prone to delay; when a plan is not maturely digested, it is prudent to defer its execution until everything is in an entire state of preparation. Procrastination is a culpable delay arising solely from the fault of the procrastinator; it is the part of a dilatory man to procrastinate that which it is both his interest and duty to perform. . . . We delay [or postpone] the execution of a thing; we prolong, or protract, the continuation of a thing; we retard the termination of a thing; we may delay answering a letter, prolong a contest, protract a lawsuit, and retard a publication." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dě-lāy, dě-lāl, dě-lāie, dě-lāye, s. [Fr. délai; Ital. dilata, from Lat. dilata, fem. of dilatus, pa. par. of differo = to put off. (Skeat.)] delft-blue, s.

Calico-printing: A mode of printing, also known as China-blue.

delft-ware, s. A kind of pottery originally manufactured at Delft, in Holland, in the fourteenth century. It was among the best of its day, being considered equal to the Italian in quality, but somewhat inferior in its ornamentation. The glaze of the delft-ware is made as follows: Kelp and Woolwich sand are calcined together, to form a vitreous mass called frit. Lead and tin are calcined to form a gray, powdery oxide. The frit is powdered and mixed with the oxide, zaffre being added to confer blue color, arsenic for dead-white. This is fused, making an opaque enamel; ground and mixed to the consistence of cream. Delft-ware is made of a calcareous clay of varying color, which is ground in water, strained, and evaporated to a plastic consistence; it is then tempered, and stored in cellars to ripen. Prolonged storage increases its tenacity and plasticity. It is then kneaded, with-out sand; formed on the wheel, dried, and partially burned, reaching the biscuit condition. The bibulous ware is then glazed, dried, packed in saggars, which are piled in the kiln and baked.

pleasure to the mind.

"Now I feed myself
With most delicious poison."
Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, i. 5.

3. Charming, affording pleasure or comfort.

"He brought thee into this delicious grove."
Milton: P. L., vii. 318.

*4. Dainty, luxurious, effeminate, given to pleasure.

"Yea, soberest men it [idleness] makes delicious."
Sylvester: Du Bartas; Week ii.

dē-lŷ-cious-lŷ, *de-li-cious-liche, adv. [Eng.
delicious; -ly.]

*1. Daintily, luxuriously.

"How much she hath glorified herself, and lived deliciously [Gr. estreniasē] so much torment and sorrow give her."—Rev. xviii. 7.

2. Delightfully; in a manner highly pleasing to any of the senses.

dē-lŷ-cious-nēss, s. [Eng. delicious; -ness.]

1. The quality of being delicious or highly pleasing to any of the senses.

"The sweetest honey Is loathsome in his own deliciousness."

lightfulness, deliciousness.

"... have fed me with fode of most delycyte."
Digby Mysteries (ed. Furnival, 1882), p. 132, l. 2039.

dē-lŷt, s. [Lat. delictum=a fault of omission; delinquo=to omit doing what one ought to do: de= away, from, and linguo=to leave.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A failure to do some act; an offense, a crime.

"According to the quality of the delict."—Hovell: Letters, p. 114.

2. Scots Law: A misdemeanor.

"Crime is generally divided into crimes properly so called, and delicts. Delicts are commonly understood of slight offenses, which do not affect the public peace so immediately."—Erskine: Inst., bk. iv, t. 4, § 1.

¶ A challenge propter delictum in English law is for some crime or misdemeanor that affects the juror's credit, and renders him infamous. This was formerly the case after a conviction of treason, felony, perjury, or conspiracy, &c. But the grounds of a challenge propter delictum are now simply having been convicted of treason, felony, or any infamous offense, which stain, however, a free pardon will obliterate, or being outlawed, or excommunicated, the latter being a species of outlawry in use in the ecclesiastical courts. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. iii., ch. xiii.)

*dēl-i-ē, *delye, a. [Fr. délié, from Lat. delicatus.] Soft, delicate, fine.

"His clothes weren maked of right delye thredes."
Chaucer: Boethius, p. 5.

*dēl-i-gā-tion, s. [Lat. deligatio, from deligatus, pa. par. of deligo=to bind up.]

Surg.: A binding up or bandaging; the regular and methodical application of bandages.

"The third intention is deligation, or retaining the parts so joined together."—Wiseman: Surgery.

dē-lŷht (gh silent), *de-lit, *de-lite, *de-lyt, s. [O. Fr. deleit, delit, from Lat. delecto=to delight;
Sp. & Port. deleitar; Ital. diletto.]

1. A state or degree of great pleasure and satisfaction; joy, rapture.

"Delight itself, however, is a weak term to express the feelings of a naturalist, who for the first time has wandered by himself in a Brazilian forest."—Darwin: Voyage round the World (1870), ch. i., p. 11.

2. That which affords or creates great pleasure or joy.

"She was his care, his hope, and his delight,
Most in his thought, and ever in his sight."
Dryden: Sigismunda and Guiscardo, II, 12.

dē-lŷht (gh silent), *de-lit-en, *de-lyt-en, v. t.
& i. [O. Fr. deleiter, deliter; Sp. delectar, deleitar; Port. deleitar; Ital. dilettare, from Lat. delecto=to delight.]

A. Trans.: To afford delight to; to please greatly; to charm.

"To delight his ear."
Shakespeare: Passionate Pilgrim, 47.

B. Reflex.: To take delight or great pleasure to one's self.

"I will delight myself in thy statutes: I will not forget thy word."—Ps. cxix. 16.

B. As adjective:

1. Full of delight; charmed, overjoyed.

*2. Attended with delight; delightful, delighting.

"If virtue no delighted beauty lack,
Your son-in-law is far more fair than black."
Shakespeare: Othello, i. 8.

¶ In the following passage the meaning of the word is very obscure; by some it is taken as delightful, the sense being: the spirit, having the power of giving delight, &c.; by others it is understood as meaning lightened or freed of incumbrance, etherealized.

"Ay, but to die, and go we know not where:
And the delighted spirit
To bathe in fiery floods."

Shakespeare: Measure for Measure, iii. 1.

†dē-lŷht-ēd-lŷ (gh silent), adv. [Eng. delighted; -ly.] In a delighted manner; with delight.

dē-lŷht-ēr (gh silent), s. [Eng. delight; -er.]

1. One who delights or affords delight.

2. One who takes delight.

"We should, concerning the author of the report, consider whether he be not ill-humored, or a delighter in telling bad stories."—Barrow: Serm., i. 250.

dē-lŷht-fŷl (gh silent), a. [Eng. delight; -ful(i).]

1. Affording delight; charming; causing or attended with great pleasure or satisfaction; exquisite, lovely.

"Come, peace of mind, delightful guest!"
Cooper: Ode to Peace.

*2. Full of delight, cheerful, joyous.

"Too chilling a doctrine for our delightful dispositions."
—C. Sutton: Learn to Die (1634), p. 16.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between delightful and charming: "When they both denote the pleasure of the sense, delightful is not so strong an expression as charming; a prospect may be delightful or charming; but the latter rises to a degree that carries the senses away captive. Of music we should rather say that it was charming than delightful, as it acts on the senses in so powerful a manner: on the other hand, we should with more propriety speak of a delightful employment to relieve distress, or a delightful spectacle to see a family living together in love and harmony." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dē-lŷht-fŷl-lŷ (gh silent), adv. [Eng. delightful; -ly.]

3. To describe; to portray in words; to set forth.

"I have not here time to delineate to you the glories of God's heavenly kingdom."—Wake.

Crabb thus discriminates between delineate and sketch: "Both these terms are properly employed in the art of drawing, and figuratively applied to moral subjects to express a species of descriptions: a delineation expresses something more than a sketch; the former conveying not merely the general outlines or more prominent features, but also as much of the details as would serve to form a whole; the latter, however, seldom contains more than some broad touches, by which an imperfect idea of the subject is conveyed. A delineation therefore may be characterized as accurate, and a sketch as hasty or imperfect; an attentive observer who has passed some years in a country may be enabled to give an accurate delineation of the laws, customs, manners, and character of its inhabitants; a traveler who merely passes through can give only a hasty sketch from what passes before his eyes." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(3) To deliver out: To distribute.

"See what I do deliver out to each."

Shakesp.: Coriolanus, i. 1.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between to deliver, to rescue, and to save: "The idea of taking or keeping from danger is common to these terms; but deliver and rescue signify rather the taking from, save the keeping from danger: we deliver and rescue from the evil that is; we save from evils that may be as well as those that are. Deliver and rescue do not convey any idea of the means by which the end is produced; save commonly includes the idea of some superior agency: a man may be delivered or rescued by any person without distinction; he is commonly saved by a superior. Deliver is an unqualified term, it is applicable to every mode of the action or species of evil; to rescue is a species of delivering—namely, delivering from the power of another; to save is applicable to the greatest possible evils: a person may be delivered from a burden, from an oppression, from disease, or from danger, by any means; a prisoner is rescued from the hands of an enemy; a person is saved from destruction." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between to deliver and to give up, see GIVE; for that between to deliver and to free, see FREE.

II. Law:

1. Eng.: The acquittal of a prisoner by the verdict of a jury.

2. Scots Law: The decision of a judge or arbitrator.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between delivrance and delivery: "Delivrance and delivery are drawn from the same verb to express its different senses of taking from or giving to; the former denotes the taking something from one's self; the latter implies giving something to another. To wish for a delivrance from that which is hurtful or painful is to a certain extent justifiable: the careful delivery of property into the hands of the owner will be the first object of concern with a faithful agent." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

II. Technically:

1. Law:

(1) The delivery of a deed, or the handing of it over to the grantee, which is expressed in the attestation, "sealed and delivered," is one of the requisites to a good deed. A deed takes effect only from this delivery; for if the date be false or impossible, the delivery ascertains the time of it. A delivery may be either absolute, that is, to the grantee himself, or to a third person, to hold till some conditions be performed on the part of the grantee. In certain cases, as wills, bonds made by a parent in favor of his children, or deeds in which the grantee has himself an interest, or where there is a mutual obligation between the parties, delivery is not required.

(2) An expression peculiar to England, also called jail delivery, a term applied to the Sessions at the Old Bailey, London, or the Assizes, when the jail is delivered or cleared of the prisoners.

*2. Mint: The moneys coined within a certain period at the mints.

3. Baseball and Cricket:

(1) The act of delivering or bowling a ball.

(2) The manner or style of delivering or bowling a ball.

(3) The ball delivered or bowled.

" . . . came in, and the first delivery from Spofforth clean bowled him."—London Daily Telegraph.

4. Founding: The draft or allowance by which a pattern is made to free itself from close lateral contact with the sand of the mold as it is lifted. Also called Draw-taper.

¶ For the difference between delivery and deliverance, see DELIVERANCE.

delivery-roller, s. That roller in a carding, paper, or calendaring, or other machine, which conducts the object finally from the operative portions of the apparatus.

delivery-valve, s. That valve through which the discharge of a pumped fluid flows, as the upper valve of the air-pump in the condensing steam-engine, through which water is lifted into the hot-well.

dēll (1), *delle, s. [A variant of dale (q. v.).] A small, narrow valley between hills; a dale, a ravine.

"Then, with mild Una in her sober cheer, High over hill and low adown the dell."

Wordsworth: White Doe of Rylstone (Introd.).

*dell (2), s. A young girl, a maid, a wench.

"Dells, are young bucksom wenches, ripe, and prone to venery, but have not yet been debauched."—Dunton: Ladies' Dictionary, 1694. (Nares.)

dēl-lā-crūs-çan, a. [For etym. see def.] Pertaining to or in any way connected with the celebrated Academy of Della Crusca at Florence.

¶ Della Cruscan School of Literature: A name applied to some English writers residing at Florence about A. D. 1785.

dēlph (1), s. [Delf (1), s.]

Hydraul. Engin.: The drain on the land side of a sea embankment. It should be at sufficient distance not to encourage the percolation of water from the outside of the bank, or the slipping of the bank from outside pressure. Thirty-six feet from the foot of the bank, 12 feet width at top, 6 feet at bottom, and a depth of 4 or 5 feet are approved proportionate dimensions. (Knight.)

dēlph (2), s. [Delf.] Delf or crockery-ware.

"A supper worthy of herself;

Five nothings in five plates of delf."—Swift.

dēl-phī-ān, dēl-phīc, a. [Lat. Delphi; Gr. Delphoi; Eng. adj. suff. -an, -ic.]

1. Lit.: Of or belonging to Delphi, a town of Phocis, in Greece, where was a celebrated oracle of Apollo.

"Behind his Delphian rock he sinks to sleep."

Byron: Curse of Minerva.

2. Fig.: Inspired, prophetic.

dēl-phīn, dēl-phīn-i-ān, a. [DELPHINE.]

dēl-phīn-āte, s. [English delphin(e); suff. -ate (Chem.) (q. v.).]

Chem.: A salt formed by a union of delphinic acid with a base.

dēl-phīne, dēl-phīn, a. & s. [Lat. delphis, delphinus=a dolphin.]

A. As adjective:

1. Ichthy.: Pertaining to the Dolphin or Delphinidae.

2. Bibliography: Prepared or published for the use of the Dauphin of France; a title given to a certain edition of the Latin classics, prepared and annotated by thirty-nine of the most eminent scholars of the time, at the command of Louis XIV., king of France, for the benefit of his son, the Dauphin of France [in usum Delphini], under the superintendence of his governor, Montausier, and his tutors, Bossuet and Huet.

B. As substantive:

Chem.: A neutral fat found in the oil of Delphinus globiceps, D. Phocaena, and D. marginatus. It is an oil which boils at 258°. It is soluble in hot alcohol. One hundred parts of delphin, saponified with potash, yield thirty-six parts of valeric acid, fifty-nine parts of deic acid, and fifteen parts of glycerin.

dēl-phīn-i-ā, dēl-phīn-ā, dēl-phī-ā, dēl-phīn-īne, s. [DELPHINE.]

Chem.: An alkaloid C₂₄H₃₅NO₂, obtained from the seeds of Delphinium staphisagria or Stavesacre. It is a yellowish-white powder which turns brown at 102° and melts at 119°. It is soluble in alcohol and ether. Delphinine when taken produces nausea, and causes irritation when rubbed on the skin. It is used as a remedy in chronic swellings of the glands.

dēl-phīn-īc, a. [Eng. delphin(e); -ic.]

Chem.: Of or pertaining to delphine.

delphinic acid, s. [VALERIC ACID.]

dēl-phīn-i-dæ, s. pl. [Lat. delphin(us)=a dolphin, and fem. adj. pl. suff. -idæ.]

1. Zool.: One of the families into which the order Cetacea is divided. It comprises such forms as the True Dolphins, the Fresh-Water Dolphins of the Ganges and Amazon, the Porpoises, the Beluga, the Orcas, and, according to some authors, the Narwhal. The members of this group possess considerable diversity in outward form, in skeletal characters, and dentition; but in all the head is of moderate size, and, with the exception of the Narwhal, they agree in having numerous conical teeth in both jaws, while nearly all have dorsal fins.

2. Palæont.: The Delphinidae are found fossil in deposits of Miocene and later date, some of the genera being now extinct.

dēl-phīn-īte, s. [Named from being found in Dauphiny; Eng. suff. -ite (Min.) (q. v.).] [DAUPHIN.]

Min.: A variety of Epidote occurring in yellowish-green crystals, sometimes transparent, and found near Bourg d'Oisans, in the Piedmontese Alps.

dēl-phīn-i-ūm, s. [Lat. delphinus=a dolphin, from the resemblance which the nectary bears to the imaginary figures of the dolphin.]

Bot.: Larkspurs, a genus of plants belonging to the natural order Ranunculaceæ. They are widely spread over the northern temperate zone. They are erect, branching, annual or perennial shrubs, with blue or violet, rarely white, race-mose flowers; calyx deciduous, petal-like, and irregular. Delphinium staphisagria, Stavesacre, has seeds which are irritant and narcotic, and yield the alkaloid delphinia (q. v.). D. Consolida is a simple astringent.

Delphinium.

1 Spur. 2 Follicle.

dēl-phīn-ōid, a. [Gr. delphis (genit. delphinos)=a dolphin, and eidos=appearance.] Resembling or partaking of the nature of a dolphin or the delphinidae.

dēl-phīn-ōne, s. [Eng. delphin; suffix -one (Chem.) (q. v.).]

Chem.: Synonymous with Valerone (q. v.).

dēl-phīn-ōp-tēr-ā, s. [Lat. delphinus=a dolphin, and Gr. pteron=a fin.]

Zool.: A sub-division of the Delphinidae established by Comte de Lacépède to include such members of that family as, like Beluge, do not possess a dorsal fin. As a generic name (Delphinopterus) it is still used by some authors, who class under it the Right Whaleporpoise, or Delphinopterus Peronii, the D. Commersonii, and D. borealis. The two former inhabit seas of high south latitudes, while the latter is found in the North Pacific. These species are about five or six feet long.

dēl-phīn-ō-rhŷā-chūs, s. [Lat. delphinus=a dolphin, and Gr. rhynchus=a snout.]

Zool.: A genus of Cetaceans, family Delphinidae, in which the beak is very long and narrow, being often four times the length of the skull. Like the True Dolphins, they have a dorsal fin, but no furrow between the beak and forehead. Some six species have been placed under this genus, of which Delphinorhynchus coronatus, which frequents the Spitzbergen Seas, is the largest, measuring from thirty to thirty-six feet.

dēl-phīn-ū-lā, s. [A dimin. from Lat. delphinus.]

dēl-phī-nūs, s. [Lat., from Gr. delphis (genit. delphinos)=a dolphin.]

1. Zool.: A genus of Cetaceans, and the typical one of the family Delphinidae (q. v.). It includes numerous species; the best known are the Common Dolphin (Delphinus delphis) and the Bottlenose Dolphin (D. tursio). The Dolphin occurs commonly in all the European seas, and is especially abundant in the Mediterranean. It is an exceedingly fast swimmer, the "schools," as the shoals are called, circling round steamers that are going at full speed as though they were stationary.

2. Palæont.: The genus Delphinus appears to date from the Miocene Tertiary, being well represented in deposits of Pliocene age. In Miocene strata also occur the Delphinoid remains, which have been referred to the genus Stereodelphis. (Nicholson.)

3. Astron.: The Dolphin, a constellation in the northern hemisphere.

dēl seg-no (segno as sän'-yō), phr. [Ital.]

Music: [DAL SEGNO.]

dēlt, s. [A contraction of the Greek letter DELTA (q. v.).] For definition see etymology.

delt-orach, s. A plant, Atriplex patula. (Prior, also Britten & Holland.)

dēl-tā, s. [The name of the fourth Greek letter, corresponding with the English d. As a capital it is formed in the shape of an equilateral triangle. Originally applied to the triangle-shaped island formed by deposits between the two mouths of the Nile; afterward applied to other similarly shaped tracts formed at the mouths of large rivers by two or more diverging branches. The deltas of many rivers, as the Ganges, Niger, Mississippi, &c., are geologically most instructive, exhibiting, as they do, perfect analogues of many of the older formations in magnitude, variety of composition, alternation of beds, and entombment of plants and animals.

"Before the Restoration scarcely one ship from the Thames had ever visited the Delta of the Ganges."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xviii.

*dēl-tā-fī-cā-tion, s. [Gr. delta; Lat. facto=to make.] The act or process of forming a delta at the mouth of a river.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hār, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

†dēl-tā-īc, a. [Eng. delta; -ic.] Pertaining to, or of the form of, a delta.

†dēl-tic, a. [Eng. delt(a); -ic.] The same as DELTAIC (q. v.).

dēl-tō-hē-drōn, s. [Gr. delto, the form delta takes when the first element in a compound, and hedra=a seat . . . a base.]

Geom.: A solid, the surface of which is formed by twenty-four deltoids. (Rossiter.)

dēl-tōid, a. & s. [Gr. deltocoidēs=delta-shaped, triangular, from Gr. delta, and eidos=form, appearance.] [DELTA.]

A. As adj.: Resembling the Greek capital letter Delta in section or outline; triangular. Applied—
1. In Anat.: To a triangular muscle of the shoulder, moving the arm.
2. In Bot.: To a leaf of a triangular or nearly triangular shape. Properly applied solely to describe the transverse sections of solids.

B. As substantive:
1. Geom.: A four-sided figure formed of two unequal isosceles triangles on opposite sides of a common base. (Rossiter.)

2. Anat.: The deltoid muscle.

deltoid-hastate, a.

Bot.: A term applied to a hastate leaf when short, and resembling the Greek capital letter Delta, as in ivy, &c.

deltoid-ovate, a.

Bot.: A term applied to a leaf having an outline between the shape of a capital Delta and an egg.

dē-lū-brūm, s. [Lat.]

1. Roman Antiquity:
(1) A shrine, a temple, or other hallowed or sacred place.

(2) That part of the temple in which the altar or statue of the deity was erected.

2. Eccles. Arch.: A font or baptismal basin.

dē-lūd-a-bil-ī-tŷ, s. [Eng. deludabl(e); -ity.]

The quality of being easily deceived or imposed upon.

dē-lūd-a-bile, a. [Eng. delud(e); -able.] Capable of being deluded; easily imposed upon or deceived.

"Not well understanding omniscience, he is not so ready to deceive himself, as to falsify unto him whose cogitation is in no ways deludable."—Broune: Vulgar Errors.

dē-lūde, v. t. [Lat. deludo=to mock, to deceive; de (intens.), ludo=to play.]

1. To deceive, to impose upon; to beguile, to cheat.

"He, after the fashion of all the false prophets who have deluded themselves and others, . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiv.

2. To frustrate, to disappoint.

"It deludes thy search."—Dryden.

† For the difference between to delude and to deceive, see DECEIVE.

dē-lūd-ēd, pa. par. & a. [DELUDE.]

dē-lūd-ēr, s. [Eng. delud(e); -er.]

1. One who deludes, deceives, or imposes upon another; a deceiver, a cheat, an impostor.

"And every blow that sinks the heart Bids the deluder rise."

Goldsmith: An Oratorio, ii.

2. One who beguiles.

"And thus the sweet deluders tune the song." Pope: Homage's Odyssey, xii. 221.

dē-lūd-īng, pr. par., a. & s. [DELUDE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of beguiling, deceiving, or imposing upon; a beguilement.

"Ananias and Sapphira's dainty deludings with a smooth lie."—Bp. Prédcaux: Euchologia, p. 228.

dēl-ūge, s. [Fr. deluge; from Lat. diluvium, from diluo=to wash away; di=dis=apart; luo=to wash.]

A. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:
1. A general overflowing of water, or inundation; specifically, the general inundation or flood in the time of Noah.

"The apostle doth plainly intimate, that the old world was subject to perish by a deluge, as this is subject to perish by conflagration."—Burnet's Theory.

2. An overflowing of the natural bounds of a river; a flood.

"No longer then within his banks he dwells, First to a torrent then a deluge swells."

Denham: Cooper's Hill, 355, 356.

II. Figuratively:

1. Applied to a torrent or flood of anything resembling water, as fire, lava, melted stone, &c.

"The beds of lava rise in successive gently-sloping plains, towards the interior, whence the deluges of melted stone have originally proceeded."—Darwin: Voyage round the World (1876), ch. i., p. 6.

2. A violent or overwhelming calamity.

B. Scripture: The great flood or cataclysm by the scriptural story stated to have been sent in punishment of flagrant sins committed by the antediluvians, all of whom were drowned with the exception of Noah, his wife, his three sons, Japheth, Shem, and Ham, with their three wives, in all eight persons, who were saved in an ark which the Patriarch was commanded to build. Three schools of thought or opinion exist with respect to the deluge. 1st. The common one that it was universal not merely as regards the human race, but with respect to the world, every part of which, the highest peak of the Himalayas not excepted, was submerged. 2d. That while drowning all mankind except the eight persons in the ark, it was partial, being limited to Central Asia. The ordinary mind will consider this view absurd, and say that the water standing high in Central Asia would run over the world, becoming shallower as it went; but the geologist knows that in such a vast flood what appears to the eye the rising of the waters is really the sinking of the land. If the land subsided in Central Asia, cracks extending to the Caspian, the Persian Gulf, &c., a deluge would be produced, while a like upheaval of the land would bring it to a termination. 3d. Bishop Colenso considers the deluge unhistorical.

† The Deluge predicted by Noah, is described in Genesis vi. vii. viii.; dated by Usher and the English Bible 2448 B. C. The following are the epochs of the deluge, according to Dr. Hales: Septuagint, B. C. 3246; Jackson, 3170; Hales, 3155; Josephus, 3146; Persian, 3103; Hindoo, 3102; Samaritan, 2998; Howard, 2698; Clinton, 2482; Playfair, 2352; Marsham, 2344; Petavius, 2329; Strauchius, 2293; Hebrew, 2288; Vulgar Jewish, 2104.

Traditions of such an event are found among many races. For these, and for the subject of the deluge generally, see Hugh Miller's Testimony of the Rocks, only be it observed that the Indian narrative of Shem, Ham, and Japheth was an impudent forgery of Captain Wilford's Hindoo Pundit, a fact of which Mr. Miller when he quoted it was not aware. [DELUGE TABLET.]

The old view that the fossils collected by the geologists were deposited during the Noachian deluge is now held only by the unenlightened, and even the Reliquie Diluviane of Dr. Buckland are attributed to an earlier submergence, the date of which is determined to have been during the Newer Pliocene period.

† For the difference between deluge and overflow, see OVERFLOW.

deluge tablet, deluge tablets, s. & s. pl.

Archeol.: The name given to a tablet or tablets (the eleventh of the Izdubar Legends) inscribed with cuneiform writing, which being translated is found to contain the Chaldean account of the deluge. Perhaps it may have been originally Accadian. A paper on the subject was read by Mr. George Smith, of the British Museum, before the Society of Biblical Archaeology, on Dec. 3, 1872 [BIBLICAL ARCHEOLOGY], and a revised translation published in 1874. What Mr. George Smith called the Flood-hero was Adra-hasis. In Babylonian proper names compounded of two elements, either might at pleasure be placed first. Reversing the relative positions of the two elements, the name becomes Hasis-adra, which being imperfectly heard by the Greeks was by them written Xithurus or Xisthrus. This pious man was ordered by the god Izdubar to make a ship of a certain number of cubits length, breadth, and height.

"Cause," it was said, "to ascend the seed of life all of it to the midst of the ship." "Into the deep launch it," Adra-hasis replied, "When by me it shall be done, I shall be derided by young men and old men."

The deity insisted:

"Into it enter, and the door of the ship turn. Into the midst of it thy grain, thy furniture, and thy goods, thy wealth (?), thy woman servants, thy female slaves, and the young men, the beasts of the field, the animals of the field: all I will gather, and I will send to thee: they shall be inclosed in thy door."

Omitting much, let the following suffice as further specimens of the tablets.

"Wine in receptacles and wine I collected like the waters of a river; also food like the dust of the earth; also I collected in boxes with my hand and placed . . . Seed of life the whole I caused to go up into the ship. . . . A flood Shamas made, and he spake, saying, 'In the night I will cause it to rain from heaven heavily; enter the midst of the ship, and shut thy door.' That flood happened, of which he spake, saying: 'In the night I will cause it to rain from heaven heavily.' . . . 'The bright earth to a waste was turned, the surface of the earth like . . . It swept, it destroyed all life from the face of the earth, the strong deluge over the people reached to heaven." . . . "In heaven the gods feared the tempest, and sought refuge, they ascended to the heaven of Anu. . . . Six days and nights passed, the wind, deluge, and storm overwhelmed. On the seventh day in its course the rain from heaven, and all the deluge which had destroyed like an earthquake quieted, the sea he caused to dry, and the wind and deluge ended."

"I perceived the sea making a tossing, and the whole of mankind turned to corruption. . . . Like reeds the corpses floated. . . . To the country of Nizir went the ship; the mountain of Nizir stopped the ship, and to pass over it was not able." "I sent forth a dove, and it left. The dove went and turned, and a resting-place it could not enter, and it returned. I sent forth a swallow, and it left. The swallow went and turned, and a resting-place it could not enter, and it returned. I sent forth a raven, and it left. The raven went, and the corpses which were in the water it saw, and it did eat, it swam and wandered away, and did not return. I sent the animals forth to the four winds. I poured out a libation. I built an altar on the peak of the mountain."—Bib. Archaeol. Soc. Trans., iii. (1874), 530-596.

dēl-ūge (1), v. t. & i. [DELUGE, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. Lit.: To overwhelm or drown with water; to flood, to inundate.

Lytton: My Novel, bk. xi, ch. ii.

dēm-a-gōg-ism, †dēm-a-gōgue-ism, s. [Eng. demagogue; -ism.] The practices or tenets of a demagogue.

"The great drag upon it—namely, demagogism—has crumbled to pieces of its own accord."—C. Kingsley: Alton Locke (Pref.).

dēm-a-gōgue, s. [Gr. demagogos, from dēmos=the people, and agōgos=leading; agō=to lead; Fr. demagogue. "Bossuet (d. 1704) first introduced the word into French." (Trench: English Past and Present, Lect. iii.)]

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, plt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; try, sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

1. In a good sense: One who is a leader of the people by his superior eloquence or oratory.

"Demosthenes and Cicero, though each of them a leader, or, as the Greeks called it, a demagogue, in a popular state, yet seemed to differ in their practice."—Swift.

2. In a bad sense: An unprincipled or factious public orator who obtains an influence over the mob by great professions, and by suiting his addresses to the prejudices of his hearers.

"In every age the vilest specimens of human nature are to be found among demagogues."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

† The occurrence of the word demagogue in the Eikon Basilike made Milton doubt whether the production emanated from Charles at all.

"Setting aside the affrightment of this goblin word [demagogue], for the King, by his leave, cannot coin English as he could money to be current, and it is believed this wording was above his known style and orthography, and accuses the whole composition to be conscious of some other author."—Milton: Eikonoclastes, § 4. (Trench: On Some Def. in our Eng. Diet., p. 26.)

dēm-a-gōg-ŷ, s. [Eng. demagog(ue); -y.] The same as DEMAGOGISM (q. v.).

"A store of figures of speech, which he airs in standing out against demagogu."—Daily News, Nov. 15, 1881, p. 6.

dē-māin, *de-mean, v. t. [Lat. de=away, from, and manus (Fr. main)=the hand.] To punish by cutting off the hand.

" . . . and then demeaning and executing them, whatin fields, and what on scaffolds, as the most desperate traitors."—Crookshank: Hist. Church of Scotland (Argyll's Declaration), ii. 316.

dē-māine, *de-meigne, *de-meine, *de-meyn, *de-meyne, s. [O. Fr. demeine, demaine, domaine; Sp., Port., & Ital. dominio, from Lat. dominium=power, jurisdiction.] Power, authority, control.

"Every creature Sometime a yere hath love in his demeine."
Gower, iii. 349.

dē-mand, v. t. & i. [Fr. demandar; Sp. & Port. demandar; Ital. dimandare, from Low Lat. demando=to demand; Lat. demando=to commit, give in trust; de=away, down, and mando=to commit.]

A. Transitive:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) To ask or claim with authority, or as a right.
"But Fate, Archilochus, demands thy breath."
Pope: Homer's Iliad, xiv. 540.

(2) To ask or claim (without any idea of authority).

(3) To question, to interrogate authoritatively.
"Demand me nothing."—Shakesp.: Othello, v. 2.

(4) To inquire; to seek to ascertain by questioning.

"Why demand you this?"—Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, v. 2.

2. Fig.: To call for, require, or necessitate.

" . . . prophecy demands A longer respite, unaccomplished yet."
Cowper: Task, ii. 66, 67.

II. Law: To sue for; to seek to obtain by legal process.

B. Intransitive:

*1. To claim, to ask as a right.

"He doth demand to have repaid a hundred thousand crowns."—Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, ii. 1.

2. To ask, to inquire.

"And the soldiers likewise demanded of him, saying, And what shall we do?"—Luke iii. 14.

† Crabb thus discriminates between to demand and to require: "We demand that which is owing and ought to be given; we require that which we wish and expect to have done. A demand is more positive than a requisition; the former admits of no question; the latter is liable to be both questioned and refused: the creditor makes a demand on the debtor; the master requires a certain portion of duty from his servant: it is unjust to demand of a person what he has no right to give; it is unreasonable to require of him what it is not in his power to do. A thing is commonly demanded in express words; it is required by implication: a person demands admittance when it is not voluntarily granted; he requires respectful deportment from those who are subordinate to him. In the figurative application the same sense is preserved: things of urgency and moment demand immediate attention; difficult matters require a steady attention." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dē-mand, *de-mande, *de-maunde, s. [French demande; Sp. & Port. demanda; Ital. dimanda.] [DEMAND, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of demanding or claiming with authority, or as a right; an authoritative claim or request.

"Demands of date-broke bonds."
Shakesp.: Timon, ii. 2.

II. Fig.: A bound, a limit, a line of separation or distinction.

"We can see why it is that no line of demarcation can be drawn between species."—Darwin: Origin of Species (1859), ch. xiv, p. 469.

dēm-arch (1), s. [Gr. demarchos, from dēmos=a district, and archō=to govern.]

Greek Antig.: The governor or chief officer of a Greek deme or district; a mayor.

I. Literally:

1. The act of marking or fixing the bounds or limits of.

2. A boundary, a limit.

II. Fig.: A bound, a limit, a line of separation or distinction.

"We can see why it is that no line of demarcation can be drawn between species."—Darwin: Origin of Species (1859), ch. xiv, p. 469.

dēm-arch (2), s. [Gr. demarchos, from dēmos=a district, and archō=to govern.]

Greek Antig.: The governor or chief officer of a Greek deme or district; a mayor.

2. The asking of a price for goods on sale, or for work done.

3. That which is demanded; a claim.

4. An earnest or peremptory question or inquiry.

"The good Anchises raised him with his hand, Who, thus encouraged, answered our demand."
Dryden: Virgil's Æneid, iii. 802, 803

5. A question, a problem, a query.

"Problems and demandes eke His wisdom was to finde and seke."
Gower, i. 146.

6. The calling for or desire to purchase anything.

"My bookseller tells me, the demand for those my papers increases daily."—Addison.

II. Technically:

1. Law:

(1) (See extract.)

"The asking of what is due. It hath also a proper signification distinguished from plaint; for all civil actions are pursued either by demands or plaints, and the pursuer is called demandant or plaintiff. There are two manners of demands, the one of deed, the other in law: in deed, as in every writ, there is express demand; in law, as every entry in land, distress for rent, taking or seizing of goods, and such like acts, which may be done without any words, are demands in law."—Blount.

(2) That which is demanded, claimed, or sued for.

† (1) Demand and supply (Polit. Econ.): A phrase used to denote the relations between the demand for any article by consumers, and the supply of it by the producers—that is, between consumption and production. These relations determine the price or exchangeable value of the various commodities. If the demand exceeds the supply then the price rises; on the other hand, if the supply exceeds the demand the price falls.

(2) In demand: Much sought after; in request.

dē-mand-a-ble, a. [Eng. demand; -able.] That may be demanded, claimed, or asked for.

"All sums demandable, for license of alienation to be made of lands holden in chief, have been stayed in the way to the hanaper."—Bacon.

dē-mand-ant, s. [Fr., pr. par. of demandar=to demand.]

Law: One who makes a demand at law; a plaintiff in a real action; a plaintiff generally.

dē-mān-dāte, v. t. [Lat. demandatus, pa. par. of demando=to give in charge to, to commend to.] To delegate or commission. (Bp. Hall: Works, x. 186.)

dē-mēph-it-ized, pa. par. or a. [DEMEPHIT-IZE.]

dē-mēph-it-iz-īng, pr. par., a. & s. [DEMEPHIT-IZE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The same as DEMEPHITIZATION (q. v.).

dē-mērgē, v. t. [Lat. demergo: de=down; mergo=to plunge.] To plunge or sink into, to immerse.

"The water in which it was demerged."—Boyle: Works, iv. 619.

dē-mēr'-lī, s. [Fr. démérite, from Lat. demeritum=a fault, neut. sing. of demeritus, pa. par. of demereo=to earn merit; demereo=to deserve well of; mereo=to earn; mereor=to merit.]

*1. (Originally): Merit, what one deserves; as demereo and mereo in Latin do not materially differ in signification.

"My demerits
May speak unbosomed to as proud a fortune
As this that I have reached."—Shakesp.: Othello, i. 2.

2. (Subsequently): The opposite of merit. One can say that a person merits punishment, as well as reward; and after the two words merit and demerit had been for a long time synonymous, convenience led to their being used in opposite senses, merit being retained for conduct worthy of praise, and demerit for that obnoxious to censure.

"Thou liv'st by me, to me thy breath resign; Mine is the merit, the demerit thine."—Dryden.

dē-mēr'-lī, v. t. & i. [Fr. démériter.]

A. Transitive:

1. To deserve, to merit either good or bad.

"If I have demerited any praise or blame."—Udall, Preface.

2. To depreciate.

"Faith . . . doth not demerit justice and righteousness."—Bp. Wootton.

B. Intrans.: To deserve, to merit either good or bad.

dē-mērse, v. i. [Latin demersus, pa. par. of demergo=to plunge in.] [DEMERGE.] To plunge into, to immerse.

dē-mēs'-mēr-ize, v. t. [Pref. de=away, from, and Eng. mesmerize (q. v.).] To release or free from mesmeric influence.

dē-mēsne' (s silent), de-main', de-mean, s. & a. [O. Fr. démâine, domâine.] The spelling demesne is false, due probably to confusion with O. Fr. mesnee or maîsnee, a household. (Skeat.)

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. An estate in land.

"Of fair demesnes, youthful, and nobly trained."—Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, iii. 5.

2. Land adjoining a mansion; a park.

"The lord of this inclosed demesne, Communicative of the good he owns,
Admits me to a share."—Cooper: Task, i. 331-33.

*3. A district, a territory.

"The demesnes that here adjacent lie."—Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 1.

II. Old English Law: 'Demesne (according to common speech) are the lord's chief manor place, with the lands thereto belonging, which he and his ancestors have from time to time kept in their own manual occupation; howbeit (according to law) all the parts of a manor (except what is in the hands of freeholders) are said to be demesne.'

B. As adj.: Of the nature of a demesne; demesneal.

dē-mēs'n'-ī-ā (s silent), a. [Eng. demesne (q. v.).] Pertaining to or of the nature of a demesne.

de-mi-bastion, s.

Fort.: A single face and flank, resembling the half of a bastion.

de-mi-bath, *de-mi-bain, s. A bath in which only half the body can be immersed.

de-mi-baton, s. (Music): A semi-breve rest.

de-mi-brigade, s.

Mil.: A half-brigade.

de-mi-cadence, s. (Music): A half-cadence, or a cadence on the dominant. [CADENCE.]

de-mi-cannon, s.

Old Ordnance: A cannon of three sizes:

(1) The lowest: A great gun that carries a ball of thirty pounds weight and six inches diameter. The diameter of the bore is six inches and two eighths parts.

(2) The ordinary: A great gun six inches four-eighths diameter in the bore, twelve feet long. It carries a shot six inches one-sixth diameter, and thirty-two pounds weight.

(3) The greatest: A gun six inches and six eighths diameter in the bore, twelve feet long. It carries a ball of six inches five-eighths diameter, and thirty-six pounds weight. (Bailey.)

de-mi-castor, s. A sort of hat.

"Nor shall any hats, called de-mi-castors, be henceforth made to be sold here."—Anderson: Origin of Commerce.

de-mi-circle, s. An instrument for measuring and indicating angles. It resembles a protractor, and has sights at each end of its diameter, also sights at each end of a rule or alidade, which has an axis over the center of the circle, so as to sweep the graduated arc. A given object being observed from a station, through the sights, the alidade is adjusted so that the other object is observable through the sights. The point of the rule then indicates the angle. In the middle of the instrument is a compass to show the magnetic bearings. By providing the instrument with telescopes, a considerable degree of accuracy may be attained, and more distant points conveniently observed. It is a modest substitute for a theodolite. The plane of the instrument is placed horizontally for taking distances, and vertically for heights. (Knight.)

de-mi-coronal, s. A half-coronet.

"Marquis Dorset, bearing a scepter of gold, on his head a de-mi-coronal of gold."—Shakesp.: Henry VIII., iv. 1 (Stage directions).

de-mi-cross, s. An instrument for taking the altitude of the sun and stars.

1. Ord. Lang.: Death, decease, especially of a royal personage or ruler.

"There has been a demise of the crown. At the instant of the demise the next heir became our lawful sovereign."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. x.

"A third attribute of the sovereign is his perpetuity. The king never dies. . . . So tender is the law of supposing even a possibility of his death, that his natural dissolution is generally called his demise, an expression which signifies merely a transfer of property; for when we say the demise of the crown we mean only that, in consequence of the disunion of the king's natural body from his body politic, the kingdom is transferred or demised to his successor; and so the royal dignity remains perpetual."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. i., ch. vii.

2. Law: A transfer or conveyance of an estate by lease or will for a term of years, or in fee-simple.

[For the difference between demise and death, see DEATH.]

de-mi-ge, v. t. [DEMISE, s.]

dēm-i-vōlt, dēm-i-vōlte, s. [Fr.]

Manège: One of the seven artificial motions of a horse, in which he raises his forelegs in a particular manner.

"Then making a démivolt in the air, with the other arm outstretched in a like manner, he wheeled round, with astonishing force, in an opposite direction."—Darwin: Voyage round the World (1870), ch. viii., p. 153.

†dē-mōb-il-iz-ā-tion, s. [Eng. demobiliz(e); -ation.] The act of disbanding or demobilizing troops; the state of being disbanded.

†dē-mōb-il-ize, v. t. [Pref. de=away, from, and mobiliz (q. v.).] To disband troops; to disarm and dismiss them to their homes.

"... it has been decided to demobilize those Reserve men now with the colors."—London Daily Telegraph.

dē-mōc-rā-ḡy, s. [Fr. démocracie; O. Fr. democratie, from Greek demokratia, from dēmos=the people, and kratos=to rule.]

1. That form of government in which the sovereign power is in the hands of the people collectively, and is exercised by them either directly or indirectly through elected representatives or delegates.

"There the form of the government is a perfect democracy."—Locke.

2. In this country one of the two great political parties into which the country is divided; opposed to republican; the Democratic party.

3. The people or populace, regarded as rulers.

† The third book of Herodotus describes it as it existed in ancient Greece, the first country perhaps where it was ever allowed scope for development. Aristotle also treated of the subject. Blackstone was of opinion that in democracy, "where the right of making public laws resides in the people at large, public virtue, or goodness of intention, is more likely to be found than either of the other qualities of government." "Popular assemblies," he says, "are frequently foolish in their contrivance, and weak in execution; but generally mean to do the thing that is right and just, and have always a degree of patriotism or public spirit."

There is a wide distinction between democracy and ochlocracy. The former is rule by the many through means of laws duly enacted; the latter is mob law, i. e., a state of anarchy in which the multitude break through all legal enactments and make their arbitrary and ever varying will the only law in force.

dēm-ō-crāt, s. [DEMOCRACY.]

1. One who supports or is in favor of a democracy.

"I would say to the most violent democrat in the kingdom, . . ."—Bishop Watson: Charge (1798), p. 19.

2. In France, a name adopted by the French republicans in A. D. 1790, their opponents being termed aristocrats.

3. In this country, a member of the Democratic party. The Southern and a portion of the Northern democrats were the defenders of slavery; the whigs and republicans its opponents.

dēm-ō-crāt-īc, dēm-ō-crāt-īc-ā-l, a. & s. [Gr. dēmokratikos, from dēmokratia=a democracy.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining to or supporting a democracy; suited for popular government.

"A class of laws artfully framed to delude the vulgar, democratic in seeming, but oligarchic in effect."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.

*B. As subst.: A democrat. (Hobbes.)

†dēm-ō-crāt-īc-ā-l-ly, adv. [Eng. democratical; -ly.] In a democratic manner; as becomes a democrat.

dē-mōc-rā-ty, dē-mōc-rā-tie, s. [DEMOCRACY.] A democracy.

"Forms of commonwealths, monarchies, aristocracies, democracies."—Burton: Anat. of Mel., p. 37.

dē-mō-crit-īc-ā-l, a. [From Democritus, a writer on the language of birds.] Pertaining to Democritus; in the style of Democritus; incredible.

"Not to mention democritical stories."—Bailey: Colloq. of Erasmus, p. 394. (Davies.)

dēm-ō-dēx, s. [Gr. dēmos=fat, and dēx=a worm. (Owen: Compar. Anat., lect. xix.)]

Entom.: A genus of Arachnida, usually placed in the family Acarina. Demodex folliculorum inhabits the sebaceous follicles of the face of many persons, especially in the vicinity of the nose.

dē-mō-gor-gōn, s. [Gr. daimōn=a spirit, a demon, and gorgos=fearful, grim. According to some, from dēmos=the people, and gorgōn=a terror.] A terrible deity in ancient mythology, whose very name was capable of producing the most dreadful effects. The title was also given to that terrible nameless deity, of whom Lucan and Statius speak, when they introduce magicians threatening the infernal gods. Spenser represents him as dwelling

"Down in the bottom of the deep abyss

In dull darkness pent."—F. Q., IV. ii. 47.

† Orons and Ades, and the dreaded name of Demogorgon. Milton: P. L., ii. 964, 965.

dē-mōḡ-rā-phy, s. [Gr. dēmos=the people, graphē=a writing, a treatise, graphō=to write.] (For definition see extract.)

It is found all over Africa, whence it finds its way occasionally to Europe and India. It is called also the Numidian Crane.

2. Entom.: Calopteryx virgo, a species of dragonfly. [DAMSEL-FLY.]

3. Music: A coupler in the organ. (Stainer & Barrett.)

dē-mōl-īsh, v. t. [Fr. démolissant, pr. par. of démolir, from Lat. demolior=to pull down: de=down, and moliō=to build, to erect; Port. & O. Sp. dimolir; Sp. demoler; Ital. demolire.]

1. Lit.: To pull or throw down; to raze; utterly to destroy; to ruin; to break or pull to pieces; to dismantle.

"Demolishing the temples at Alexandria."—Jortin: On Ecclesiastical History.

† 2. Fig.: Utterly to destroy or reduce to nought.

"I expected the fabric of my book would long since have been démolished, and laid even with the ground."—Tillotson.

† Crabb thus discriminates between to démolish, to raze, to dismantle, and to destroy: "A fabric is démolished by scattering all its component parts; it is mostly an unlicensed act of caprice; it is razed by way of punishment, that it may be left as a monument of public vengeance; a fortress is dismantled from motives of prudence, in order to render it defenseless; places are destroyed by various means, and from various motives, that they may not exist longer. Individuals may démolish: justice causes a raze; a general orders towns to be dismantled and fortifications to be destroyed." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dē-mōl-īshed, pa. par. or a. [DEMOLISH.]

dē-mōl-īsh-ēr, s. [Eng. demolish; -er.] One who or that which demolishes; a destroyer.

dē-mōn-stra-bly, adv. [Eng. demonstrab(le); -ly.] In a manner beyond doubt or contradiction; in a manner that admits of clear proof or demonstration; clearly, evidently, incontrovertibly.

"He should have compelled his ministers to execute the law in cases that demonstrably concerned the public cause."—Clarendon.

dē-mōn-strañce, dē-mon-straunce, s. [Old Fr. demonstrance, from Lat. demonstrans, pr. par. of demonstro=to demonstrate (q. v.).]

1. A demonstration; a clear and incontrovertible proof.

"Demonstrances of how many calamities obstinacy is the cause."—Holland.

2. A sign, an indication.

"The heavenly signs maketh demonstrance

How worldly thynges goo forward."

Lydgate: Minor Poems, p. 60.

dē-mōn-stra-te, dēm-ōn-stra-te, v. t. & i. [Lat. demonstratus, pa. par. of demonstro=to show fully; de (intens.), and monstro=to show; O. Sp. & Port. demonstrar; Sp. & Port. demonstrar; Ital. dimostrare; Fr. démontrer.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. To point out, to show, to indicate.

"Description cannot suit itself in words

To demonstrate the life of such a battle."

Shakesp.: Henry V., iv. 2.

2. To prove beyond the possibility of doubt or contradiction; to prove in such a manner as to show that the contrary position is evidently absurd.

"Very few propositions in politics can be so perfectly demonstrated as this, that parliamentary government cannot be carried on by two really equal and independent parliaments in one empire."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

II. Anat.: To exhibit or point out the parts, as of a body when dissected.

B. Intrans.: To prove clearly beyond doubt or contradiction.

dē-mōn-stra-tēd, dēm-ōn-stra-tēd, pa. par. or a. [DEMONSTRATE.]

"Did your letters pierce the queen to any demonstration of grief?"—Shakesp.: King Lear, iv. 3.

2. The act of demonstrating, or proving beyond the possibility of doubt or contradiction.

"What appeareth to be true by strong and invincible demonstration."—Hooker.

3. A clear or incontrovertible proof; indubitable evidence.

"Which way soever we turn ourselves, we are encountered with clear evidences and sensible demonstrations of a Deity."—Tillotson.

4. A public exhibition or declaration of principles, numbers, or objects, by any party.

5. A public display or manifestation of feeling.

II. Technically:

1. Anat.: The exhibition or pointing out of parts, as of a body, when dissected.

2. Logic: A series of syllogisms, all whose premises are either definitions, self-evident truths, or propositions already established. Demonstrations may be either positive or negative, a priori or a posteriori. A positive (or direct) demonstration proceeds by positive or affirmative propositions; a negative (or indirect) demonstration, also called reductio ad absurdum, proves the truth of any proposition by proving the absurdity of the contrary position. A demonstration a priori proves a proposition by deduction from a necessary cause, or by conclusions drawn from something previously known or proved. A demonstration a posteriori proves a cause from an effect or a conclusion by something posterior, whether an effect or consequence.

3. Math.: A mode of proof by which any proposition is proved as a necessary consequence of assumed or already proved premises.

4. Mil.: A movement of troops toward any position, as if to make an attack.

"He wolde wende . . . to Darye . . . saun demorance."—Alisaunder, 4, 120.

Dēmōsthē-nī-an, a. [Demosthen(es), and Eng. adj. suff. -ian.] The same as DEMOSTHENIC (q. v.).

Dēmōsthē-nīc, a. [Fr. Démosthénique, from Lat. Demosthenius=pertaining to Demosthenes; Gr. Demosthenēs. (See def.)]

1. Of or pertaining to Demosthenes, the most celebrated of Greek orators; born at Pœnia, in Attica, B. C. 385, died by his own hand about B. C. 322. Many of his speeches are still extant, and from those in which he inveighed so bitterly against Philip of Macedon we derive the term Philippic (q. v.).

2. In the style or manner of Demosthenes.

dēmōt-īc, a. & s. [Gr. dēmōtikos=pertaining to the people; dēmos=the people.]

A. As adjective:

*1. Of or belonging to the people; popular, common.

2. Applied specifically to the alphabet used by the laity and people of Egypt after 500 or 600 B. C., in contradistinction to that used by the priestly caste, which was called the hieratic, and of which it was a simplified form.

"At the time of the Ptolemies three languages were extant in Egypt: the hieroglyphic or dead Egyptian; the demotic or vernacular, the spoken language of the day written in a simpler manner by cursive signs on a modified hieroglyphic system, and standing in the same relation to it as modern English compared with the dead Anglo-Saxon."—Cooper: Monumental Hist. of Egypt, 1876, p. 8.

B. As subst.:

The demotic language of Egypt.

"A dictionary of hieroglyphic and demotic has been published."—Athenaeum, October 14, 1882.

dēmōunt, v. i. [Fr. démonter=to dismount.] To fall down.

"If it do not Pilâtre-like explode, and demount all the more tragically."—Carlyle: French Revol., pt. i., bk. ii., c. vi.

dēmp-stēr (p silent), s. [DEEMSTER, DOOMSTER.]

dempt (p silent), pret. & pa. par. [DEEM.]

dēmp-tion, s. [Lat. demptio, from demptus, pa. par. of demo=to take away.] A taking away.

"Colysion, abjection, contraction, or demption of the vowel, as this: thayre for the ayre, thadvice for the advice. Symphonies."—Huloet.

dēmūlce, v. i. [Lat. demulceo=to soothe down: de=down, and mulceo=to soothe.] To soothe, to pacify, to appease, to soften.

"Saturn was demulced or appeased."—Sir T. Elyot: The Governour, bk. i., ch. 20.

dēmūl-çent, a. & s. [Lat. demulcens, pr. par. of demulceo=to soothe down.]

A. As adj.:

Softening, mollifying, lenitive.

"Mild and demulcent in the highest degree."—Arbuthnot.

B. As substantive:

Med.: Any medicine which protects sensitive parts of the body from the irritating action of other substances; anything which allays irritation.

dēmūl-sion, s. [Latin demulceo=to soothe down.]

1. The act of flattering or soothing.

2. That which soothes or flatters; flattery or soft words.

"The soft demulsion of a present contentment."—Feltham: Resolves, 37.

dēmūr, de-moure, de-murre, v. i. & t. [Fr. demourer; O. Fr. demourer=to stay, abide; Ital. dimorare; Sp. & Port. demorar, from Lat. demoror=to delay: de (intens.), and moror=to delay; mora=delay, hesitation.]

A. Intransitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. Lit.: To tarry, to remain, to delay.

"And the sayde Peloponesyans demoured in the land."—Nicoll: Thucydides, fol. 72.

2. Figuratively:

(1) To delay, to loiter.

"Yet durst they not demoure, nor abyde upon the camp."—Nicoll: Thucydides, fol. 73.

(2) To hesitate, to pause in doubt or hesitation

"They demurring,

I undertook that office."—Milton: P. R., i. 373, 374.

(3) To doubt, to have scruples or doubts.

"That wills, and demurs, and resolves, and chooses, and rejects."—Bentley.

(4) To object; to state objections or difficulties; to take exception (generally followed by to).

II. Law: To stop or take exception to any point in the pleadings as insufficient.

*B. Transitive:

1. To doubt, to hesitate, or scruple about.

"The latter I demur."—Milton: P. L., ix. 658.

2. To put off.

"He demands a fee,

And then demurs me with a vain delay."—Quarles.

† Crabb thus discriminates between to demur, to hesitate, and to pause: "The idea of stopping is common to these terms, to which signification is added some distinct collateral idea for each. We demur from doubt or difficulty; we hesitate from an undecided state of mind; we pause from circumstances. Demurring is the act of an equal: we demur in giving our assent: hesitating is often the act of a superior; we hesitate in giving our consent: when a proposition appears to be unjust we demur in supporting it, on the ground of its injustice; when a request of a dubious nature is made to us we hesitate in complying with it: prudent people are most apt to demur; but people of a wavering temper are apt to hesitate: demurring may be often unnecessary, but it is seldom injurious; hesitating is mostly injurious when it is not necessary; the former is employed in matters that admit of delay; the latter in cases where immediate decision is requisite. Demurring and hesitating are both employed as acts of the mind; pausing is an external action: we demur and hesitate in determining; we pause in speaking or doing anything." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dēmūr, s. [DEMUR, v.]

1. A doubt, hesitation, or scruple about anything.

"Without any demur at all."—South.

2. An objection or scruple stated; an exception taken.

"All my demurs but double his attacks."

Pope: Prol. to Sat., 66.

† Crabb thus discriminates between demur, doubt, hesitation, and objection: "Demurs are often in matters of deliberation; doubt in regard to matters of fact; hesitation in matters of ordinary conduct; and objections in matters of common consideration. It is the business of the counselor to make demurs; it is the business of the inquirer to suggest doubts; it is the business of all occasionally to make a hesitation who are called upon to decide; it is the business of those to make objections whose opinion is consulted. Hesitation lies mostly in the state of the mind: objection is rather the offspring of the understanding. The hesitation interferes with the action; the objection affects the measure or the mode of action." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dēmūre, a. [Fr. de mœurs=of good manners.]

*1. (Originally.) Sober, grave, modest. The term did not at first imply that all this might possibly be hypocritical, and that the real character might be the opposite of what it appeared.

"These and other suchlike irreligious pranks did this Dionysius play, who, notwithstanding, fared no worse than the most demure and innocent."—H. More: Antidote against Atheism, bk. iii., ch. 1. (Trench: Select Glossary, pp. 53, 54.)

2. (Subsequently.) Affectedly modest; coy.

"Hell's fiercest fiend! of saintly brow demure,"

Thomson: Liberty, iv. 69.

dēmūre, v. i. [DEMURE, a.] To look with affected modesty.

"Your wife Octavia, with her modest eyes

And still conclusion, shall acquire no honor

Demurring upon me."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, iv. 15.

dēmūred, a. [Eng. demur(e); -ed.] Marked with demureness.

"Voice demur'd with godly paint."

Henshaw: Daily Thoughts, p. 187.

dēmūre-lŷ, adv. [Eng. demure; -ly.]

1. Soberly, gravely.

"Wear prayer-books in my pocket, look demurely."

Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, ii. 2.

2. With affected modesty.

"Next stood Hypocrisy with holy leer, Soft smiling, and demurely looking down."

Dryden: Pulamoni and Arcite, ii. 564, 565.

*3. Solemnly.

"Hark! the drums

Demurely wake the sleepers."

Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, iv. 9.

*4. In accordance with custom.

dēmūre-nēss, s. [Eng. demure; -ness.]

*1. (Originally.) Sobriety, gravity, modesty.

"Which advantages God propounds to all the hearers of the gospel, without any respect of works or former demureness of life, if so be they will but now come in and close with this high and rich dispensation."—Henry More: On Godliness, bk. viii., ch. v. (Trench: Select Glossary, pp. 53, 54.)

2. (Subsequently.) Affected modesty or gravity.

dēmūr-i-tŷ, s. [Eng. demur(e); -ity.]

1. Demureness.

"They pretend to such demurity as to form a society for the regulation of manners."—T. Brown: Works, ii. 182.

2. One who acts demurely; a demure character.

"She will act after the fashion of Richardson's demurities."—Lamb.

†dēmūr-rā-ble, a. [Eng. demur; -able.] That may be demurred to; open to demur, exception, or objection.

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bençh; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tjon, -sion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, çc = bel, dej.

dē-mūr-rage (rage as rīg), s. [Eng. demur; age.]

I. Ord. Lang.: In the same sense as II. 2.

II. Technically:

1. Maritime Law:

(1) The time during which a vessel is detained by the freighter beyond what is named in the charter-party in loading or unloading. A vessel thus detained is said to be on demurrage.

(2) The compensation or allowance made by the freighter of a vessel for such delay or detention. Demurrage must be paid in every case except when the delay is caused by tempestuous weather, any fault of the owner, captain, or crew of the vessel, or detention by an enemy.

"The ship was delayed at a demurrage of a hundred dollars a day."—Burke: Against Warren Hastings.

2. Railway: A similar compensation or allowance payable for delay in loading or unloading railway cars beyond a certain specified period allowed for the purpose.

3. English Bank: The allowance of 1½d. per ounce made to the Bank of England in exchanging coins or notes for bullion. The metallic value of standard gold is £3 17s. 10½d. per oz.; at the Bank of England £3 17s. 9d. is given for it without any delay. If it were taken to the Mint there would be a delay of some days before it could be converted into coin. The difference of 1½d. per oz., by which this delay is avoided, is called demurrage. (Bithell.)

dē-mūr-rā-l, s. [Eng. demur; -al.] Demur, doubt, hesitation.

"The same causes of demurrage existed."—Southey: Life of Nelson, i. 74.

dē-mūr-rant, s. [Eng. demur; -ant.] One who demurs, a demurrer.

"The demurrer argues first."—Jacob: Law Dict.

dē-mūrred, pa. par. or a. [DEMUR.]

dē-mūr-rēr, s. [Eng. demur; -er.]

I. Ord. Lang.: One who demurs, hesitates, objects, or takes exception to anything.

"Is Lorenzo a demurrer still?"

Young: Night Thoughts, ix. 1366.

II. Law: A stop or abiding upon a point of law, to be determined by the judges; an issue upon matter of law. A demurrer in law confesses the facts to be true, as stated by the opposite party, but denies that, by the law arising upon those facts, any injury is done to the plaintiff, or that the defendant has made out a legitimate excuse (according to the party which first demurs, demoratur, rests or abides upon the point in question), as, if the matter of the plaintiff's complaint, or declaration, be insufficient in law, as by not assigning any sufficient trespass, then the defendant demurs to the declaration; if, on the other hand, the defendant's excuse or plea be invalid, as if he pleads that he committed the trespass by authority from a stranger, without making out the stranger's right; then the plaintiff may demur in law to the plea. A demurrer in equity is nearly of the same nature as a demurrer in law; being an appeal to the judgment of the court whether the defendant is bound to answer the bill; as, for want of sufficient matter of equity therein contained; or where the plaintiff, upon his own showing, appears to have no right; or where the bill seeks a discovery of a thing which may cause a criminal misbehavior. For any of these causes a defendant may demur to the bill. And if, on demurrer, the defendant prevails, the plaintiff's bill, unless he be allowed to amend, is dismissed. If the demurrer is incident to criminal cases, as well as civil, when the fact as alleged is allowed to be true, but the prisoner joins issue upon some point of law in the indictment, by which he insists that the fact, as stated, is no felony, or whatever the crime is alleged to be. A general demurrer is for some defect in substance, a special demurrer for some defect in form. (Blackstone: Comment.)

"A prohibition was granted, and hereunto there was a demurrer."—Ayliffe: Parergon.

dē-mūr-rīng, pr. par., a. & s. [DEMUR, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: The act of hesitating, doubting, objecting, or taking exception to anything.

2. Law: The act of putting in a demurrer.

dē-my', dēm-y', s. & a. [DEMI.]

A. As substantive:

1. Paper-making: A name given to certain sizes of drawing, printing and flat writing-paper, varying with different makers unfortunately, but usually as follows: Drawing, 20x15 inches; writing, 21x16 inches; printing, 22½x17¼ inches.

*2. Comm.: A gold coin, anciently current in Scotland.

3. University: The name given to those members of the foundation of Magdalen College, Oxford, England, who in other colleges are styled scholars—originally half-fellows, as being on probation for fellowships, but since the alteration in the statutes there is no longer any connection between a demyship and a fellowship.

*4. Dress: A close-fitting garment.

"He . . . stript him out of his golden demy or mandilion, and flead him."—Nashe: Lenten Stuff.

B. As adjective:

*1. Ord. Lang.: The same as DEMI (q. v.).

II. Technically:

1. Her.: A term for any charge that is borne half, as a demy-lion or half-lion.

2. Paper, Bibliography, &c.: Of the size of demy paper; made of demy paper.

demy-ostage, s. A woollen stuff used in Scotland.

dēm (1), *denne, s. [A. S. denn, cogn. with O. Dut. denne = a floor, a platform; Ger. tenne = a floor.] [DENE.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A cave or hollow place in the earth.

2. The hiding-place of a wild beast.

3. A narrow glen, a dell, a ravine, a wooded hollow.

*4. A cot, a hut.

5. A dirty or squalid place of resort or residence.

6. A place of resort of low characters.

II. Philol.: As the termination to names of places it means dell or glen; as Clieveden, &c.

dēm (2), s. [A corruption from good even, good e'en=good evening.] Good evening; a form of salutation used by our ancestors as soon as noon was past.

dēm (1), v. t. & i. [DEN (1), s.]

1. Trans.: To hide, to secrete.

2. Intrans.: To live in dens.

"They den among rocks."—Chambers, s. v. Snake.

dēm (2), v. t. [Probably a mistake for dem, which is the reading of one MS.] To dam up water.

"The ischew off a louch to den;
And leyt it out into the nycht."
Barbour, xiv. 354.

īdē-nār-cōt-ize, v. t. [Pref. de=away, from, and nar, narcotize (q. v.).] To deprive of or free from narcotine; to take away the narcotic principle or quality.

dē-nār-I-āte, s. [Low Lat. denariata, from Lat. denarius.]

Old Law: As much land as was worth one denarius a year. It is given by different authors variously as an acre and a perch. (Blount.)

dē-nār-I-ūs, s. [Lat., from deni=ten, by ten; decem=ten.]

I. Roman Antiquities:

1. A Roman silver coin, originally of the value of ten asses or pounds of copper; but afterward of sixteen asses, when the weight of the as was reduced to one ounce in B. C. 217. It was equivalent to sixteen or seventeen cents of our money.

2. A gold coin struck during the empire; its full title was denarius aureus, and it was generally called aureus, but by Pliny uniformly denarius. It passed for twenty-five silver denarii.

*II. Old Eng. Law: A penny. Denarius Dei, God's penny, or earnest money given and received by parties in a contract, &c. Denarius sancti Petri, St. Peter's pence (q. v.). Denarius tertius comitatus.

When county courts had superior jurisdiction in England, two-thirds of the fines were reserved for the king, and one-third, or a penny, to the earl of the county, who either received it in specie or had an equivalent for it out of the exchequer. (Paroch. Antiq., 418.)

dē-nār-ra-ble, a. [Lat. denarro=to relate.]

Proper to be related; capable of being related. (Ash.)

Denarius.

lent to about sixteen or seventeen cents of our money. It continued to be the ordinary silver currency down to the age of the Emperor Septimius Severus and his sons, by whom pieces composed of a base alloy were introduced.

2. A gold coin struck during the empire; its full title was denarius aureus, and it was generally called aureus, but by Pliny uniformly denarius. It passed for twenty-five silver denarii.

*II. Old Eng. Law: A penny. Denarius Dei, God's penny, or earnest money given and received by parties in a contract, &c. Denarius sancti Petri, St. Peter's pence (q. v.). Denarius tertius comitatus. When county courts had superior jurisdiction in England, two-thirds of the fines were reserved for the king, and one-third, or a penny, to the earl of the county, who either received it in specie or had an equivalent for it out of the exchequer. dē-nār-ra-ble, a. [Lat. denarro=to relate.] Proper to be related; capable of being related. (Ash.)

dē-nār-rā-tion, s. [Lat. denarratus, pa. par. of denarro=to relate.] A narration. (Ash.)

dē-na-rīy, a. & s. [Lat. denarius=containing ten.]

A. As adj.: Containing ten; tenfold.

B. As substantive:

1. The number ten; a body of ten men; a division of an army.

"They may very well be compared to . . . centuries, that are composed of denaries."—Sir Kenelm Digby: Suppl. to Cabala, p. 248.

2. A tithing, a decennary.

"He divided hundreds into tithings or denaries."—Holinshead: Descr. of England, ch. iv.

3. A denarius.

"A hundred denaries, or pieces of sylver coyna."—Udall: Matthew, ch. xix.

dē-nā-tion-āl-iz-ā-tion, s. [Eng. denationalize(e); -ation.] The act or process of denationalizing; the state of being denationalized.

dē-nā-tion-āl-ize, v. t. [Pref. de=away, from, and Eng. nationalize (q. v.).] To divest of national character or nationality by transference to another nation.

"A public crime, the commission of which can expose the ships of any power to be denationalized."—Declar. of the Prince Regent (Jan., 1813).

dē-nā-tion-āl-iz-ēr, s. [Eng. denationalize(e); -er.] One who or that which denationalizes.

"Hot water has not been a denationalizer."—Blackwood's Magazine.

dē-nā-tion-āl-iz-īng, pr. par., a. & s. [DENATIONALIZE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: Denationalization.

dē-nāt-u-rā-l-ize, v. t. [Pref. de=away, from, and Eng. naturalize (q. v.).]

1. To render unnatural.

"It is easier to undermine in the hearts of subjects their reverence for rank and station, than it is to dissolve the ties of parentage and brotherhood, or to denaturalize the hearts of children."—Chalmers: Bridgewater Treat., pt. i., ch. vi., p. 176.

2. To deprive of the condition of a naturalized citizen of any country; to denationalize.

"They also claimed the privilege when aggrieved of denaturalizing themselves, or, in other words, of publicly renouncing their allegiance to their sovereign, and of enlisting under the banners of his enemy."—Prescott.

dē-nāt-u-rā-l-ized, pa. par. or a. [DENATURALIZE.]

dē-nāt-u-rā-l-iz-īng, pr. par., a. & s. [DENATURALIZE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of depriving of the condition of naturalization; denaturalization.

dē-nāt-u-rāte, v. t. [Pref. de=away, from, and natura=nature.] To render unnatural; to denaturalize.

dē-nāy, s. [DENY.] A denial or refusal.

"My love can give no place, bide no deny."—Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, ii. 4.

dē-nāy, v. t. [DENY.] To deny, to refuse.

"What were those three,
The which thy proffered curtesie deny?"—Spenser: F. Q., III. vii. 67.

dēn-dic-u-lūs, s. [Lat. denticulus, dimin. of dens (genit. dentis)=a tooth.]

Arch.: A member in the Ionic and Corinthian entablatures, occurring between the zoëphorus and corona, and, properly speaking, a part of the latter; so called because it represents denticuli or small teeth, placed at intervals apart. (Weale.)

dēn-dra-chāte, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and achates=an agate.]

Min.: Arborescent or moss-agate; agate exhibiting in its sections the forms or figures of vegetable growth.

dēn-drān-thrō-pōl-ō-gy, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and Eng. anthropology (q. v.).] A study based on the theory that man had sprung from trees.

"He formed, therefore, no system of dendranthropology."—Southey: The Doctor, ch. cxxv.

Denticulus.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, there; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mātē, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, æ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

dên-drâs'-pl-dæ, s. pl. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and aspis (genit. aspidos)=an asp.]

Zool.: A family of Snakes, natives of South Africa. The fangs are very long, poison-bearing, and erect. Dendraspis angusticeps, the narrow-headed Dendraspis, is of an olive-brown color, tinged with green; in length it is about six feet; its body long and thin. It is a good climber.

dên-drêr'-pê-tôn, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and herpeton=a lizard, a snake; herpō=to creep.]

Palæont.: A small, lizard-like reptile, discovered by Mr. Dawson and Sir C. Lyell in the Lower Coal-measures of Nova Scotia; so named from its being found in the interior of a fossil trunk, and hence supposed to have been of arboreal habits. (Page.) It is now believed to be a Labyrinthodont, and is ranked by Professor Miall under the tribe Microsauria.

dên-dri-form, a. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and Lat. forma=form, shape.] Having the form or appearance of a tree; arborescent.

dên-drite, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and English suff. -ite (Min.) (q. v.).]

Min.: A stone or mineral on or in which are the figures of shrubs, mosses, or other vegetable growth; an arborescent or dendritic mineral. The colors are due to the traces of organic matter, or of oxides of iron, manganese, or titanium.

dên-drit'-ic, dên-drit'-ic-al, a. [English dendrit(e); -ic, -ical.]

Mineralogy: 1. Resembling a tree; dendriform, arborescent; a term applied to certain branching moss-like figures which appear on the surfaces of the fissures and joints in rocks. They are strictly organic and of chemical origin, as much so as the dendritic frost-work on the surface of a window-pane on a winter's night.

"Moss-agate or Mocha-stone, filled with brown moss-like or dendritic forms distributed through the mass."—Dana: Mineralogy, p. 196.

2. Marked by or containing figures resembling shrubs, mosses, and other vegetable growth.

"Dendritic agate, containing brown or black dendritic markings."—Dana: Mineralogy, p. 196.

dên-drô'-bl-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. dendrobium (q. v.), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of Orchids, of the tribe Malacæ.

dên-drô'-bl-ûm, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and bios=life. So named because they are found on trees.]

Bot.: A genus of Orchids, the typical one of the family Dendrobidæ. The anther is two-celled, with four pollen masses with no separate stigmatic gland. Above 200 are known, some of them with fine flowers, others of more humble character. Of the former type are Dendrobium nobile, D. Chrysanthemum, D. Gibsoni, D. finbriatum, and D. densiflorum. About eighty are cultivated in greenhouses. Their native country is the East Indies.

dên-drô'-çol'-a, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and kolos=hollow.]

Zool.: A section of Scolicida, belonging to the sub-order Planarida (q. v.). They have the intestines branched or arborescent, and the body flat or broad.

dên-drô'-cô-lâp-têg, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and kolaptō=to peck.]

Ornith.: The Hook-billed Creepers, a genus of birds belonging to the sub-family Dendrocolaptinæ, and family Certhidæ, or Creepers. They are natives of South America.

dên-drô'-cô-lâp-ti-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. dendrocolapt(es), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Ornith.: A sub-family of birds belonging to the family Certhidæ, or Creepers. They are natives of South America.

dên-drô'-çyng-næ, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and Lat. cygnus=a swan.]

Ornith.: The Tree Ducks, a genus of aquatic birds belonging to the family Anatidæ. The toes are long and project beyond the membrane, enabling them to perch on trees, whence the name.

dên-drô'-dên-tine, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and Eng. dentine (q. v.).] A term applied to a modification of the fundamental tissue of the teeth produced by the aggregation of several simple teeth into one mass, the blending of the dentine, enamel, and cement, producing a dendritic appearance.

dên-drô'-dônt, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and odontos=a tooth.]

Palæont.: One of an extinct family of fishes, consisting of a single genus, Dendrodus, characteristic of the Old Red Sandstone or Devonian System. The name is derived from the section of their seemingly simple conical teeth, which presents numerous fissures radiating or spreading like the branches of a tree from a central mass of vasodentine, or vascular uncalcified tissue. (Page, &c.)

dên-drô'-dûs, s. [Greek dendron=a tree, and odontos=a tooth.]

Palæont.: A genus of fossil fishes, the typical one of the family Dendrodonts (q. v.). Prof. Huxley places it under the family Glyptodipterini, and Dr. Traquair doubtfully under the Holoptychiidae. Found in the Old Red Sandstone of Elgin and Moray, in Scotland, and also in Russia.

dên-drôg'-ra-phý, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and graphê=a writing; graphō=to write.] A discourse or treatise on or description of trees; dendrology.

dên-drô'-grâp-tûs, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and graptos=painted . . . marked with letters, written, the fossil bearing a certain resemblance to written characters on the matrix in which it lies.] [GRAPTOLITE.]

Palæont.: A genus of fossil Hydrozoa, consisting of plant-like spreading and branched growths, furnished with a strong footstalk. The branchlets carry upon one side a series of little chitinous cups or cellulose, each of which must have contained a polypite. They are exclusively confined to the Upper Cambrian and Lower Silurian formations. The genus may be ranked with the Graptolites, or may be one of the Sertularia.

dên-drôid, dên-drôid-al, a. [Gr. dendroeidēs=tree-like, from dendron=a tree, and eidos=form, appearance; Fr. dendroïde.] Having the form or appearance of a tree or shrub.

dên-drô-it, s. [Fr. dendroïte; Gr. dendron=a tree, and Eng. suff. -ite=-ite (Min.) (q. v.).] A fossil which has some resemblance in form to the branch of a tree.

dên-drôl'-a-gûs, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and lagos=a hare.]

Zool.: A genus of marsupial animals belonging to the Kangaroo family. They are natives of New Guinea.

dên-drôl'-lîte, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and lithos=a stone.] Fossil wood; a general term for any fossil stem, branch, or other fragment of a tree.

dên-drôl'-ô-gist, s. [Eng. dendrolog(y); -ist.] One who is skilled in dendrology.

dên-drôl'-ô-gý, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and logos=a word, a discourse.] A treatise on or description of trees; dendrography.

dên-drôm'-êr, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and metron=a measure.] An instrument for measuring the height and diameter of trees, to estimate the cubic feet of timber therein. It has means for taking vertical and horizontal angles, and is mounted on a tripod stand. Adjusting screws, circular racks and pinions, afford means for adjusting the limbs of the instrument, and altering their position, as circumstances may require. (Knight.)

"Of timber measures and dendrometers there are various kinds, and their use is for taking the dimensions of standing timber without climbing the tree."—Louden: Encycl. of Gardening, § 1780.

Zool.: A genus of rodent quadrupeds, belonging to the mice family, and consisting of a single species, Dendromys typus, an animal about three inches and a half long, with a tail four and a half inches. It frequents the branches of trees, where it forms its nest, and brings forth its young. It is a native of South Africa.

dên-drô-nês'-sæ, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and Epic nêsso, Attic nêsso=a duck.]

Ornith.: A genus of Anatidæ (Ducks). Dendro-nessa sponsa is the Summer-duck of the United States. It frequents fresh-water ponds and creeks, and sometimes builds even in mill-dams. D. galericulata is the Mandarin Duck.

dên-drôph'-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. dendroph(is), and Lat. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of snakes, sub-order Colubri-formes. The body and tail of these snakes are much compressed, or are very slender and elongate; the head is distinct from the neck, and has a wide gape. The Dendrophidæ are diurnal in their habits, living in trees, and are extremely active climbers; their colors assimilate with the surrounding foliage. They occur in all tropical regions, are innocuous, and feed principally on tree-lizards. Two genera are classed under this family—Chrysopelea and Dendrophis.

dên-drôph'-is, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and ophis=a serpent.]

Zool.: A genus of snakes, family Dendrophidæ (q. v.), with smooth scales, which are much larger along the back than on the sides; the sides of the abdomen are slightly keeled. This genus occurs in India, the East Indies, and Australia, and its members are not venomous.

dên-drô-phýl'-lî-a, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and phyllon=a leaf.]

Zool. & Palæont.: A genus of deep-sea corals, ranging from the chalk to modern times.

dên-drô-plêx, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and plêxis=a stroke, a blow.]

Ornith.: A genus of birds belonging to the Certhidæ, or Creeper family.

dên-drô-pû'-pæ, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and Lat. pupa.]

Zool.: A genus of gasteropodous Mollusks proposed by Mr. Dawson for the reception of the single specimen, Pupa vetusta, discovered in the Coal-measures of Nova Scotia, in the hollow trunk of an erect Sigillaria. Nicholson thinks the shell is so remarkably like some living chrysalis-shells, that there is no sufficient reason for framing a new genus for its reception.

dên-drô-saur'-æ, s. pl. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and saura=a lizard.]

Zool.: The name given by Dr. J. E. Gray to a tribe of Saurians, sub-order Pachyglossæ. The scales of the belly, the sides, and the back, are granular. The tongue is elongate, sub-cylindrical, worm-like, very extensible. The eyes are globular, very mobile, with a small central round opening. The toes are equal, united into two opposing groups. It contains but a single family, Chameleontidæ (q. v.).

dên-drô-sô'-mæ, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and sōma=a body.]

Zool.: A genus of Rhizopoda, belonging to the family Acinetina. Body conical, thick, soft, and smooth, alternately branched; branches incrassate and tentaculate at the end. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

dên-drôs-træ'-æ, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and ostreum=an oyster.]

Zool.: A genus of Mollusca belonging to the oyster family.

dên-drô-stýle, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and stilos=a pillar.]

Zool.: A stout pillar supporting a thick flat quadrate disk in the Rhizostomidæ.

dên-drôph'-i-ûm, s. [Gr. dendron=a tree, and phûs=growth.]

Bot.: A genus of Hyphomycetous Fungi, consisting of molds growing over dead herbaceous plants.

dêne (1), s. [A. S. denu=a valley.] [DEN (1), s.]

1. A valley, a dell.

"Thou says thou trawez me in this dene."—E. Eng. Allit. Poems; Pearl, 196.

2. As an element in place-names it means valley, dell.

dêne (2), s. [DUNE.] A hillock, a bank.

dêne (3), s. [DEAN.]

Deneb, s. [A corruption of Arab. zanab=a tail.]

Astron.: A fixed star of magnitude two and a half, called also Deneb Aleet, Denebola, and Beta Leonis.

Deneb Adige, s.

Astron.: A fixed star of the first magnitude, called also Arided and Alpha Cygni.

Deneb Aleet, s.

Astron.: A fixed star, of magnitude two and a half, called also Deneb, Denebola, and Beta Leonis.

Deneb Algiedi, s.

Astron.: A fixed star, of magnitude three and a half, called also Delta Capricorni.

Dê-nêb'-ôl-a, s. [Corrupted Arabic.]

Astron.: A fixed star, of magnitude two and a half, called also Deneb Aleet, Deneb, and Beta Leonis.

dên'-ê-gâte, v. t. [Lat. denegatum, sup. or denego=to deny; de (intens.), and nego=to deny.] [DENY.] To deny.

dên'-ê-gâ'-tion, s. [Lat. denegatio.] A denying or denial.

dêne'-hóles, s. pl. [A. S. denn=a cave; Eng. hole.]

English Archæol.: Ancient artificial excavations, consisting of a round vertical shaft, from 2 ft. 6 in. to 3 ft. in diameter, ending below in a cavern in the chalk. The shafts were usually descended by means of footholes in the sides. The chambers in the oldest, simplest, and shallowest are usually mere expansions of a beehive shape; in the deeper pits the cavern may consist of a series of chambers symmetrically ranged around the shaft, or the walls of the chambers may have disappeared, and the roof be supported by pillars of chalk. Of three recently descended by the Essex Field Club at Hangman's Wood, near Grays, Essex, England, the greatest length was about 70 ft., breadth 46 ft., and height 18 ft., and they were all about 80 ft. deep. Though often very close together, no communication has hitherto been found between adjacent pits. Deneholes may be entirely in the chalk, or their shafts may be almost wholly in overlying beds. In England they abound most in Kent, north of the North Downs, and in Essex, between Purfleet and East Tilbury. A very few of the older and simpler pits have been explored; they are found to date back to the Stone Ages. The deeper ones still need examination. It has been sometimes conjectured that deneholes were excavated for the purpose of obtaining chalk or flint, but as they are especially concentrated both at Bexley (Kent), and near Grays, where fifty to sixty feet of gravel and Thanet sand overlies the chalk, though in each instance there is plenty of bare chalk within a mile, this explanation cannot apply in their case. They were probably storehouses and places of occasional refuge. On the Ordnance maps the word is spelled daneholes, suggesting a closer connection with the Danes than appears to have been the case. [For information about deneholes see the paper by Mr. F. C. J. Spurrell, read at the Royal Archaeol. Inst. in April, 1881, and since published.] (T. V. Holmes, Esq., F. G. S.)

dén-guê, s. [Said to be a mistake for English dandy; the disease, when it first made its appearance in the British West India Islands, being called the dandy-fever, from the stiffness and constraint caused to the limbs. This the Spaniards mistook for their word dengue=prudery, which might also be very well used for stiffness or constraint.]

Med.: A continued fever common in this country and in the East and West Indies, and Africa. The chief symptoms are severe pain in forehead, limbs, back, and joints, with an eruption like measles, or rather erysipelas, with painful swellings. The pains are of an agonizing character, and apt to recur. The acute stage lasts seven or eight days, and then desquamation begins.

dé-ní-a-ble, a. [Eng. deny; -able.] Capable of being denied; that may or can be denied or contradicted.

"The negative authority is also deniable by reason."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

dé-ní-ál, s. [Eng. deny; -al.]

1. The act of denying, contradicting, or refusing. "Word of denial in thy labras here."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, i. 1.

2. A negation; a contradiction of the truth of any statement; or the contrary to affirmation. "An entire denial of the miracles."—Trench.

3. A denying or refusing to confess or own to; the contrary to confession. "Denial would but make the fault fouler."—Sidney.

4. An abjuration; a rejection or refusing to acknowledge; a disowning. "We act our confessions or denials of Him."—South.

5. Loosely: A failure to obtain.

"Such a total denial of success has certainly been very rare in the present century."—London Times: Transit of Venus.

6. A restraint of one's appetites or desires; self-denial.

dén-ní-ance, s. [Eng. deny; -ance.] Denial.

"Either for the affirmation or denial of the same."—Hall: Edward IV., an. 22.

dén-níed', *de-nayed, *de-nyed, pa. par. or a. [DENY.]

dé-ní-ér (1), s. [Eng. deny; -er.]

1. One who denies, contradicts, or maintains the negative of a proposition.

"And the denier by the word Virtue means only courage."—Watts.

2. One who disowns, abjures, or refuses to acknowledge.

"Christ looked his denier into repentance."—South.

3. One who refuses to grant or concede anything.

"It may be I am esteemed by my denier sufficient of myself to discharge my duty to God as a priest, not to men as a prince."—King Charles.

dén-ní-ér (2), s. [Fr., from Lat. denarius (q. v.).] A small French coin=the twelfth part of a cent of American money.

"I'll not pay a denier."—Shakesp.: Henry IV., iii. 3.

dén-ní-gráte, v. t. [Lat. denigratum, sup. of denigro=to blacken: de (intens.), and nigro=to make black; niger=black.]

"Hartshorn and other white bodies will be denigrated by heat."—Boyle: Works, i. 111.

dén-ní-grā-tion, s. [Latin denigratio, from denigro.] A making black, a blackening.

"These are the adventitious and artificial ways of denigration."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. vi., ch. 12.

dén-ní-grāt-ér, s. [Eng. denigrat(e); -or.] One who or that which blackens or denigrates.

dén-im, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Fab.: A colored, twilled cotton cloth, used for overalls.

"Cotton jeans, denime, drillings, bed-tickings, &c."—Contemp. Review.

Dén-is, s. [From St. Denis or Denys, the first Bishop of Paris and the patron saint of France.] A name much affected by the faithful of the Roman Catholic Church, and particularly among the Irish. (The appellation has acquired a similar position in this country with the name Jonah, for an analogous reason.)

¶ Your name is Denis=You are doomed to disappointment (the allusion being to the supposititious trials of a mythical Irishman of that name).

"Ex-Senator Ingalls was introduced to a Kansas City audience as 'one of the great orators of the age and the peerless master of the English language.' Stepping to the footlights Mr. Ingalls said: 'I am obliged to Maj. Warner for the eulogistic phrases in which he has presented me. He, however, forgot to allude to the title which is the most distinguished I enjoy at present. He did not allude to the fact that my name is "Denis;" that I am the man who got left. That is my most distinguished title to notoriety and attention to-day.'"—New York America.

denis d'or, s. [Fr.]

Mus.: An instrument having a finger-board like a piano and pedals like an organ, capable of producing a vast number of different qualities of sound. It was invented in 1762 by Procopius Divis, in Moravia. (Stainer & Barrett.)

dén-ní-son, s. [DENIZEN.]

dé-ní-tráte, v. t. [Pref. de=away, from, and Eng. nitrate (q. v.).] To disengage or set free nitric acid from.

dé-ní-trā-tion, s. [Eng. denitrat(e); -ion.] The act or process of disengaging or freeing nitric acid.

dén-nít-rí-fy, v. t. [Pref. de=away, from; Eng. niter; and Lat. facio (pass. fiō)=to make.] To deprive or free of niter.

dén-ní-zā-tion, s. [Eng. deniz(en); -ation.] The making any one a denizen, citizen, or subject.

"That the mere Irish were reputed aliens appears by the charters of denization, which in all ages were purchased by them."—Davies: On the State of Ireland.

dén-ize', *den-nize, v. t. [DENIZEN, s.]

1. To make a denizen, citizen, or subject; to denizen.

"There was a private act for denizing the children of Richard Hills."—Styche: Edward IV., an. 1552.

2. To naturalize.

"The Irish language was free denized in the English pale."—Holinshead: Dugor. Ireland, ch. 1.

dén-ní-zen, s. [Derived by Wedgwood, with whom Skeat agrees, from O. Fr. deinzein, a word formed by adding the suff. -ein=Lat. -anus, to O. Fr. deinz=Fr. dans=within, from within.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: A citizen, an inhabitant.

"... the world's tired denizen."

Byron: Child Harold, ii. 26.

2. Fig.: One who inhabits or dwells in; a resident.

"Thus th' Almighty Sire began: Ye gods, Natives, or denizens of blest abodes."

Dryden: Virgil's Æneid, x. 5, 6.

II. Law: A denizen is an alien born, but one who has obtained naturalization, making him an American citizen. He thus occupies a middle position between an alien and a natural-born citizen.

dén-ní-zen, v. t. [DENIZEN, s.]

1. Lit.: To make a denizen, citizen, or subject; to naturalize.

2. Fig.: To admit to rights and privileges as a citizen.

"Falsehood is denizen'd, virtue is barbarous."

Donne.

dén-ní-zened, pa. par. or a. [DENIZEN, v.]

"As soon as denizenized they domineer."—Dryden.

dén-ní-zen-ship, s. [Eng. denizen; -ship.] The state of being a denizen.

dénk, a. [DINK.]

1. Neat, trim, gay.

"Young lustie gallandis I held mair in dæwie, and deirar be full mekill, Na him, that dressit me sa denk."

Dunbar: Maitland Poems, p. 58.

2. Saucy, nice.

"Bot echo was sumthing denk, and dangerous."

Dunbar: Maitland Poems, p. 67.

dén-nar, *den-nare, s. [DINNER.]

dén-nēt, s. [From the name of the inventor.]

Vehicles: A light, open, two-wheeled carriage like a gig, hung by a combination of three springs; two of which are placed across the axle, at right angles with it, the third being suspended from them behind by shackles.

"In those days men drove gigs, as they since have driven stanophes, tilburys, dennets, and cabriolets."—T. Hook: Gilbert Gurney, vol. ii., ch. xi.

dén-niāg, s. [DEN (1), v.] A place where beasts make their lair.

"This serpent hath no nestling, no stabling, no denning."—Ward: Sermons, p. 158.

dén-nóm-in-a-ble, a. [Lat. denomino=to denominate (q. v.).] That may be named, denominated, or denoted.

"An inflammation consists of a sanguineous affluxion, or else is denominable from other humors."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. iii., ch. 3.

dén-nóm-in-âte, v. t. [DENOMINATE, a.]

1. To name; to give a name, epithet, or title to.

"Those places which were denominated of angels and saints."—Hooker: Eccles. Polity.

2. To give a right or title to a name.

"The two faculties that denominate us men, understanding and will."—Hammond.

¶ For the difference between to denominate and to name, see NAME.

dén-nóm-in-âte, a. [Lat. denominatus, pa. par. of denomino=to name: de=down, and nomino=to name; nomen=a name.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Named, designated, entitled, denominated.

2. Arith.: A term applied to a qualifying number, or one which expresses the kind of unit treated of: thus, in seven pounds, seven is a denominated number; but seven, when used without reference to any concrete units, is an abstract number.

dén-nóm-in-ât-éd, pa. par. or a. [DENOMINATE, v.]

dén-nóm-in-ât-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DENOMINATE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of naming, designating, or denoting; a denomination.

dén-nóm-in-â-tion, *dén-nóm-in-â-çion, s. [Fr. denomination; Sp. denominacion; Port. denominação; Ital. denominazione; Prov. denominetio; all from Lat. denominatio, from denominatus, pa. par. of denomino.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of naming or designating.

2. A name or appellation given to a thing; an epithet, a designation.

"The liking or disliking of the people gives the play the denomination of good or bad; but does not really make or constitute it such."—Dryden.

3. A class, society, collection, or sect.

"Philosophy, the great idol of the learned part of the heathen world, has divided it into many sects and denominations."—South.

II. Technically:

1. Arithmetic:

(1) Gen. (of concrete quantities): Figures similarly designated. Thus in the expression £1 2s. 6d. and £4 4s. 3d., £1 and £4 are of the same denomination, 2s. are of the same denomination as 4s., and 6d. of the same as 3d.

(2) Spec. (of fractions): Having the same denominator.

2. Eccles.: A religious communion, a section of the Christian Church; a body of professing Christians holding essentially the same tenets, and more or less closely bound together, either under a common government or under governments of the same type. It is more frequently used generically of a number of sects holding identical views as to Church government than of a single one of those sects; thus the Baptist denomination is a term more frequently used than the Particular Baptist denomination, and the Presbyterian denomination than the Reformed Presbyterian denomination.

¶ The Three Denominations:

Eccles.: The name given to a union formed in England in A. D. 1727 of representatives belonging to the Presbyterians, the Independents or Congregationalists, and the Baptists, with the view of making a direct approach to the reigning sovereign. It still exists, and at intervals meets and acts.

¶ For the difference between denomination and name, see NAME.

dén-nóm-in-â-tion-ál, a. [Eng. denomination; -al.] Pertaining to or connected with a denomination.

¶ Denominational System of Education:

Education: A system of education carried on by the British Government through means of the several religious denominations. When the Government of the country began to adopt the view that a duty lay upon it to educate the children or see that they received education, two courses were open to it. It might have ignored all previous efforts made in a similar direction by churches or benevolent individuals, and all private or "adventure" schools. Or it might have availed itself of all these efforts, aiding with the protection of a conscience clause fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fáll, father; wê, wêt, hêre, camel, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pô, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, râle, fûll; trÿ, sÿrian. æ, œ = ê; ey = â. qu = kw.

all schools worthy of its countenance, stimulating them to increased exertion, and confining its own direct efforts to places which they had neglected to occupy. The former plan would have been national in the fullest sense of the word, but would have been very expensive, and would have provoked antagonism from the religious bodies ignored. In England the first efforts of Government were in the direction of the denominational system, and when the Education Act of 1870 brought into existence a multitude of "board schools," these were designed to supplement, and not to supersede, the denominational schools previously existing. In India the historic development was in exactly an opposite direction. The Government first founded schools and colleges of its own, excluding Christianity from them, not through antagonism to it, but because the money to support them was derived from taxes levied on Hindoos and Mohammedans. In 1854 Sir Charles Wood, afterward Lord Halifax, extended pecuniary support to the missionary schools, colleges, and "institutions" in India, as an acknowledgment of the good secular education which they imparted, purposely forbearing to inquire whether or not Christianity was taught. Thus, though the denominational is supposed to be the antithesis of the national system of education, the two exist side by side and in conjunction with each other with but little friction both in Britain and in India, and the energy of all friends of education of whatever type is enlisted for mutual coöperation in a great work.

dē-nōm-i-nā-tion-al-ism, s. [Eng. denominational; -ism. Trench, writing in 1855, characterized this as a "monstrous birth," and considered that it was found chiefly, if not exclusively, in dissenting magazines. (Eng. Past and Present, Lect. iv.)]

1. The act of ranking one's self with some denomination; attachment to a denomination; party spirit in defending its tenets.

2. Spec.: Attachment to the view that education is best carried out through the several religious denominations. (English.)

dē-nōm-in-ā-tion-al-ist, s. [Eng. denominationalist; -ist.] One in favor of denominationalism.

dē-nōm-i-nā-tion-āl-ly, adv. [Eng. denominational; -ly.] According to denomination; by denominations or sects.

dē-nōm-in-a-tive, a. & s. [Eng. denominat(e); -ive.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Giving or conferring a name or designation; denominating.

"Connotative names have hence been also called denominative, because the subject which they denominate is denominated by or receives a name from the attribute which they connote."—J. S. Mill: System of Logic, bk. i., ch. iii., s. 6.

2. Bearing or capable of bearing a distinct appellation; denominable.

"The least denominative part of time is a minute, the greatest integer being a year."—Cocker: Arithmetic.

II. Gram.: Applied to a verb derived from a substantive or adjective.

"Such denominative verbs abound in every member of our family."—Whitney: Life and Growth of Language, ch. vii., p. 181.

B. As substantive:

*1. Ord. Lang.: That which has the character of a denomination.

2. Gram.: A verb formed from a noun either substantive or adjective.

dē-nōm-in-a-tive-ly, adv. [Eng. denominative; -ly.] By denomination.

dē-nōm-in-ā-tōr, s. [Lat.]

I. Ord. Lang.: He who or that which denominates or gives a name; he from whom or that from which a denomination or appellation is derived.

"Both the seas of one name should have one common denominator."—Brownie: Vulgar Errors.

II. Technically:

1. Arithmetic:

*1. (See extract).

"The denominator of any proportion is the quotient arising from the division of the antecedent by the consequent; thus 6 is the denominator of the proportion that 30 hath to 5, because 5/30/6. This is also called the exponent of the proportion or ratio."—Harris.

(2) The denominator of a fraction is the number below the line which shows into how many parts the integer is supposed to be divided: thus in the fraction $\frac{1}{4}$, 4 is the denominator, and shows that the integer is supposed to be divided into four equal parts, while the numerator, 3, shows that of these four parts three are supposed to be taken.

2. Alg.: The expression under the line in a fraction: thus in the fraction $\frac{1}{16}$, 16 is the denominator.

dē-nōt-a-ble, a. [Eng. denot(e); -able.] Capable of being denoted or distinguished.

"In hot regions, and more spread and digested flowers, a sweet savor may be allowed, denotable from several human expressions."—Brownie: Miscell., p. 25.

dē-nōt-āte, v. t. [Lat. denotatus, pa. par. of denoto.] To denote, to mark out.

"These terms denote a longer time."—Burton: Anat. of Melancholy, p. 716.

dē-nō-tā-tion, s. [Lat. denotatio, from denoto = to denote (q. v.).] The act of denoting, marking, or distinguishing; separation or distinction by name.

dē-nōt-a-tive, a. [Lat. denotat(us), pa. par. of denoto, and Eng. adj. suff. -ive.] Having the power or quality of denoting or marking out.

"The alteration it produces is so denotative, that a person is known to be sick by those who never saw him in health."—Letters upon Phlogistony, p. 121.

dē-nō-te, v. t. & i. [Fr. dénoter; Sp. & Port. denotar; Ital. denotare, from Lat. denoto = to mark out: de = down, and noto = to mark; nota = a mark.]

I. Transitive:

1. To mark, to betoken, to show or indicate by a mark or sign; to signify visibly.

2. To betoken; to be a sign or symptom of; to indicate, to imply.

"Sweet scent, or lovely form, or both combined, Distinguish every cultivated kind; The want of both denotes a meaner breed."—Cooper: Hope, 290-92.

II. Intrans.: To betoken, to indicate, to be a sign.

"If it be not, then love doth well denote Love's eye is not so true as all men's."—Shakesp.: Sonnets, 148.

† Crabb thus discriminates between to denote and to signify: "Denote is employed with regard to things and their characters; signify with regard to the thoughts or movements. A letter or character may be made to denote any number, as words are made to signify the intentions and wishes of the person. . . . In many cases looks or actions will signify more than words." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dē-nōt-ēd, pa. par. or a. [DENOTE.]

dē-nō-te-mēt, s. [Eng. denote; -ment.] A sign or indication.

"They are close denotements working from the heart."—Shakesp.: Othello, iii. 3. (Quarto 1.)

dē-nōt-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DENOTE.] A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of marking out or distinguishing.

dē-nōt'e-ment (ment as mong), s. [Fr., from dénouer = to untie; dé = Lat. dis = apart; nouer = to tie in a knot; noue = a knot; Lat. nodus.] The unraveling of the plot of a story; the winding up or catastrophe of a plot; the issue or result.

"The denouement, as a pedantic disciple of Bossu would call it, of this poem is well conducted."—Warton: Essay on Pope, i. 250.

dē-nōu-nce, v. t. & i. [Fr. dénoncer; Sp. & Port. denunciar; Ital. denunziare from Lat. denuntio = to declare: de = down, and nuntio = to announce; nuntius = a messenger.]

I. Transitive:

*1. To proclaim, to declare.

"Under the leading and name of his sonne Constans, whom of a monk he had denounced Augustus or Emperor."—Holland: Camden, p. 85.

*2. To denote or express in a threatening manner. "He ended frowning, and his look denounced Desperate revenge."—Milton: P. L., ii. 106, 107.

3. To threaten publicly; to proclaim as a threat.

"Against all others unsparing vengeance was denounced."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

4. To accuse, to inform against, to charge, to delate.

"Archdeacons ought to . . . denounce such as are negligent."—Ayliffe: Parergon.

5. To cry down, to inveigh against, to condemn, to stigmatize.

II. Intransitive:

1. To declare in a solemn or threatening manner.

"I denounce unto you, this day, that ye shall surely perish."—Deut. xxx. 18.

2. To declare war; to threaten.

"If not denounced against us, why should not we Be there in person?"—Shakesp.: Ant. and Cleop., iii. 7.

dē-nōu-nce-ed, pa. par. or a. [DENOUNCE.]

dē-nōu-nce-e-mēt, s. [Eng. denounce; -ment.] A denouncing or declaring in a threatening manner; a denunciation.

"False is the reply of Cain upon the denouncement of his curse, My iniquity is greater than can be forgiven."—Brownie: Vulgar Errors.

dē-nōu-nce-ēr, s. [Eng. denounc(e); -er.] One who denounces.

"Here comes the sad denouncer of my fate, To toll the mournful knell of separation."—Dryden.

dē-nōu-nce-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DENOUNCE.] A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: Denouncement, denunciation.

dē-nō-ve-mēt, s. [Formed from Lat. de = from; novus = new; with Eng. suff. -ment.] A revolution.

"I intend now to present a denouement of affairs."—North: Ecumen, p. 595. (Davies.)

dē-nō-vō, phr. [Lat.] Anew, afresh; from the beginning.

dēnš, s. [Lat.]

Anat.: A tooth (q. v.).

dēnš, dēnsh, a. [DANISH.] Danish.

dēnš-ālx, s. [O. Scotch denš, and Dan. alx = an ax.] A Danish ax.

"Of these only fourscore could be furnished with muscaths, pickes, gunnis, halberds, denšes, or Lochaber axes."—P. Elgyn: Morays Statist. Acc., v. 16, N.

dēnse, a. [Lat. densus; Fr. dense; Sp., Port., & Ital. denso; cogn. with Gr. dasy = thick, dense.]

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

1. Thick, close, compact, approaching to solidity; having the constituent parts closely united.

"All denše bodies are colder than most other bodies, as metals, stone, glass; and they are longer in heating than softer bodies."—Bacon.

2. Crowded, thickly populated.

"The decks were denše with stately forms."—Tennyson: Mort d'Arthur, 196.

II. Figuratively:

1. Deep, thick-headed; as, denše ignorance.

2. Stupid, obtuse.

B. Bot.: Having an abundance of flowers very close together.

dēns e-nēss, s. [Eng. denše; -ness.] The quality or state of being denše; density.

dēns e-ly, adv. [Eng. denše; -ly.] In a denše manner or state; closely, compactly.

dēn-shire, v. t. [See extract.] For def. see extract.

"Burning of land, or burn-bating, is commonly called denšshiring, that is, Devonshiring, or Denbighshiring, because most used or first invented there."—Mortimer.

dēn-sim-ē-tēr, s. [Lat. densus = thick, and Gr. metron = a measure.] An instrument contrived by Colonel Mallet, of the French army, and M. Bianchi, for ascertaining the specific gravity of gunpowder. It consists of a glass globe having a tube which communicates with a quantity of mercury in an open vessel. The globe is joined at top to a graduated glass tube, which may, by means of a flexible tube, be connected with an air-pump. A diaphragm of chamois skin fits over the lower, and one of wire-cloth over the upper orifice of the globe, and the tubes above and below those orifices are provided with stop-cocks. For ascertaining the density of the gunpowder, the air is exhausted from the globe by means of the air-pump, until the mercury rises to a certain mark on the graduated tube, when the globe is detached from its support and weighed; it is then emptied and cleaned, and a given weight of gunpowder introduced, when it is again attached to the tubes and the air exhausted as before, filling with mercury all the space in the globe not occupied by the powder, up to the mark before indicated; the stop-cocks are now closed, and the globe once more detached and weighed. The absolute specific gravity of the powder is obtained by multiplying the weight of the powder contained in the globe by the known specific gravity of mercury, and dividing the product by the product resulting from multiplying the difference between the weight of the globe when filled with mercury alone, and its weight when filled with mercury and powder, into the weight of the powder employed in the experiment.

dēns-i-tē, s. [Fr. densité; Sp. densidad; Port. densidade; Ital. densità, from Lat. densitas, from densus = thick, dense.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: The quality of being denše, close, or compact; closeness, compactness; denseness.

2. Fig.: Depth; as, the denšity of ignorance.

II. Phys.: That quality of a body which depends upon the denseness or close cohesion of its constituent particles. It is estimated by the proportion which the bulk bears to the weight. Thus, if there be two bodies of equal bulk, but of different weights, then the body of greater weight is of greater density. Or if two bodies be of equal bulk boil, boy; pout, jowl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = i. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

but of different densities, then the body which is of greater density contains the proportionately greater quantity of matter. Or if two bodies contain the same quantity of matter, but one of different bulk, then the body which is of the less bulk is of a greater density than the other. Thus the density is seen to be directly proportional to the quantity of matter, and indirectly proportional to the bulk.

"The air within the vessels being of a less density, the outward air would press their sides together."—Arbuthnot: On Aliments.

dént (1), dint, dunt, dynt, dyntte, s. [A variant of dint (q. v.).]

*1. A blow, a stroke.

"He schal hym sle with dethes dent."

Octovian, 1,001.

2. A mark, hollow, or depression caused by a blow; a notch, an indentation.

"The bullet made a very considerable dent in a door."—Spratt: Hist. Royal Society.

dént (2), s. & a. [Lat. dens (genit. dentis)=a tooth.]

A. As substantive:

1. Weaving: One of the splits of the reed which is fixed in the swinging lathe, and whose office it is to beat the web-thread up to the web.

2. Mach.: A tooth of a gear-wheel.

3. Carding: The wire staple that forms the tooth of a card. [CARD.]

4. Locksmith: A salient knob or tooth in the works of a lock.

B. As adjective:

Her.: Indented.

dént, dent-en, dint-en, dynt-en, v. t. [DENT, s. DINT, v.] To make a dent, hollow, or depression in; to indent.

"A part of the wall was shattered as if by gunpowder, and the fragments had been blown off with forces sufficient to dent the wall on the opposite side of the room."—Darwin: Voyage round the World (1870), ch. iii., p. 62.

dént-al, a. & s. [Lat. dens (genit. dentis)=a tooth, and Eng. adj. suff. -al; Fr. dentat; Ital. dentale.]

A. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Of or pertaining to the teeth.

2. Gram.: Pronounced or formed by the teeth with the tongue.

"The Hebrews have assigned which letters are labial, which dental, and which guttural."—Bacon.

B. As substantive:

1. Gram.: A letter or articulation formed by placing the end of the tongue against the upper teeth, or the gum immediately above them. The dentals are d, t, and th. When two dentals come together, the first is sometimes changed into a sibilant; as O. Eng. mot-te=moste=most, wit-te=wiste=wist.

"The dental consonants are easy, therefore let them be next: first the labial-dentals, as also the lingua-dentals."—Holder.

2. Conchol.: A shell belonging to the family Dentalidae; a tooth-shell.

"Two small black and shining pieces seem, by the shape, to have been formed in the shell of a dental."—Woodward.

dental arches, s. pl.

Anat.: Arches consisting of the teeth, the gums, and the alveolar borders of the maxillæ, all which are situated within the lips and cheeks. (Quain.)

dental articulator, s. An instrument for matching the dentures of the upper and lower jaw.

dental-canals, s. pl.

Anat.: The bony canals through which the vessels and nerves pass to the interior of the teeth.

dental-cartilage, s.

Anat.: The cartilaginous elevation, divided by slight fissures, on the biting margins of the gums in infants, prior to dentition. It is a substitute for the teeth.

dental-cavity, s.

Anat.: A cavity in the interior of the teeth, in which is situated the dental pulp (q. v.).

dental chisel, s. A chisel for excavating cavities in the teeth or cutting the natural teeth preparatory to filling. They have straight or oblique edges, and are used by a pushing action. Tools of other shapes used by a lateral, rotatory, or drawing action, are excavators, drills, burs, &c. (q. v.)

dental-cut dovetail, s. A dovetail having a number of dents on each part fitting within the interdental space of the fellow-portion. Drawers and well-constructed boxes are thus secured at their corners.

dental drill, s. An instrument for cutting out carious portions of teeth, for opening out a nerve-cavity, for plugging, or for the insertion of a pivot. The drills are sized and shaped for their work. (Knights.)

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fäll, father; wê, wét, hère, camel, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pôt, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, rûle, fûll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ä. qu = kw.

dental file, s. A file made for use in operative or mechanical dentistry. Dental files are of various kinds.

dental foramen, s.

Anat.: A foramen, i. e., an aperture leading into the dental canal.

dental forceps, s. The dentist uses a variety of operating-forceps. Some are distinguished by their objective names, others by shape or peculiar conformation, and others by the kind of duty.

dental formula, s. A formula or notation used by zoologists to denote the number and kind of teeth of a mammaliferous animal, the teeth forming one of the elements in its generic character. Thus the dental formula of Man is I. $\frac{2}{1}$, C. $\frac{1}{1}$, P. M. $\frac{2}{2}$, M. $\frac{3}{3}$ =32; that is, there are four incisors in either jaw, with one canine, two premolars (or false molars), and three molars on either side of these incisors, both in the upper and in the lower jaw. In other words, the incisors being taken as the center, the upper figures refer to the upper jaw in either side, and the lower figures to the lower jaw.

Anat.: Two ridges prolonged downward from the lower surface of the alveolar arch.

dental hammer, s. An instrument for plugging teeth; operated by the alternate pressure and relaxation of pressure of the stock upon the point. The plugging-tool presses against the filling in the tooth; pressure on the case makes the tool-stock recede, imparting its movement to the lifting-bar and hammer, until the bar passes the incline of the wedge, releases its hold on the catch, and releases the hammer, which descends under the influence of the spring. The force is adjusted by devices operated by an exterior band.

dental plugger, s. An instrument for compacting the metallic filling of teeth. The point of the plugger continues to press upon the metal in the cavity of the tooth, being actuated by the tension of the spring, while the tube is reciprocated and acts by concussion on the end of the stem.

dental-pulp, s.

Anat.: A pulaceous substance of a reddish gray color, very soft and sensible, which fills the cavity of the teeth.

dental pump, s. An apparatus used for withdrawing the saliva from the mouth during dental operations. [SALIVA-PUMP.]

dén-tál'-l-i-ðé, s. pl. [Lat. dens (genit. dentis)=a tooth, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: The Tooth-shells, a family of Mollusca, consisting of the single genus Dentalium (q. v.).

dént-al-ite, s. [Lat. dens (genit. dentis)=a tooth, and Gr. lithos=a stone.]

Palæont.: A fossil Dentalium or Tooth-shell.

dén-tā'-l-i-ûm, s. [Lat. dens (genit. dentis)=a tooth.]

1. Zool.: A genus of Gasteropodous Mollusks, the typical one of the family Dentalidæ. It has a tubular, smooth, or longitudinally striated shell, open at both ends. The common name for the genus is Tooth-shells. There are numerous species.

2. Palæont.: Several species have been described from the Devonian, and more especially from the Carboniferous rocks, some of them of great size. The Secondary rocks have yielded a considerable number of species, and they become still more numerous in the Tertiaries. (Nicholson.)

dén-tār'-l-a, s. [Lat. fem. of dentarius=pertaining to the teeth, from dens (genit. dentis)=a tooth.]

Bot.: Coral-root. A genus of Cruciferous plants, belonging to the family Arabidæ. The pod is narrow, lanceolate, and tapering; the valves flat, generally separating elastically, nerveless; the seed-stalks broad. Dentaria bulbifera, the Bulbiferous Coral-root, has a creeping root with thick fleshy scales or tooth-like processes, lanceolate leaves, and large purple flowers.

dént-a-rý, a. & s. [Lat. dens (genit. dentis)=a tooth, and Eng. adj. suff. -ary.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the teeth or dentition; bearing teeth.

B. As substantive:

Comp. Anat.: That bone in the lower jaw of fishes and reptiles, corresponding to the lower jaw of man, which carries the teeth.

dentary bone, s.

Anat.: [DENTARY, B.]

dén-tā'-tā, s. [Lat. fem. of dentatus=toothed.]

Anat.: A name given to the second vertebra of the spinal column, from the tooth-like (odontoid) process which occurs in it at the upper end.

dén-tâte, dén-tât'-éd, a. [Latin dentatus=toothed.]

Bot.: Toothed. A term applied to the short and triangular divisions, the results of incisions existing at the margin of leaves. These incisions or dentate parts are caused by a failure of parenchyma. The term is also applied to the free triangular extremities of the divisions forming a gamosepalous calyx and a gamopetalous corolla.

dentate-ciliate, a.

Bot.: A term applied to a dentate margin, fringed or tipped with cilia.

dentate-sinuate, a.

Bot.: The same as DENTATO-SINUATE (q. v.).

dentated suture, s.

Anat.: Any serrated suture; a suture in which the contiguous margins of the bones are subdivided or broken up into projecting points and recesses fitting very closely to each other. (Quain.)

dén-tâte-lý, adv. [Eng. dentate; -ly.]

Bot.: In a dentate manner.

† The following combinations with this word occur in botany: DENTATE-CILIATE (q. v.); dentately-lobed, toothed so as to appear lobed; dentately-pinnatifid, toothed so as to appear pinnatifid; dentately-runcinate, toothed so as to appear runcinate; dentately-ser- dentately-serrate, having the margin divided into incisions resembling the teeth of a saw; dentately-sinuate, the same as DENTATO-SINUATE (q. v.).

dén-tā'-tion, s.

[Lat. dentatus=2. Dentate-sinuate leaf of Hypochaeris glabra.]

1. The same as DENTITION (q. v.).

"How did it get its barb, its dentation?"—Foley.

2. An indentation.

"You could see . . . every dentation of the wall."—Besant & Rice: By Celia's Arbor, ch. i. (1878.)

dén-tā'-tō, in comp. [Lat. dentatus=toothed.] Toothed, dentato-crenate, a.

Bot.: Applied to a leaf divided at the edge into triangular notches; crenato-dentate.

dentato-laciniate, a.

Bot.: Having the teeth irregularly extended into long points.

dentato-serrate, a.

Bot.: Having the teeth taper-pointed and directed forward like serrations.

dentato-sinuate, a.

Bot.: Having the margin scalloped and slightly toothed.

dént'-éd (1), a. [Eng. dent (1), s.; -ed.] Marked with a dent or indentation; indented.

dént'-éd (2), a. [English dent (2), s.; -ed.] Dentated, toothed.

dentated chisel, s.

Sculp.: A chisel with a dentated edge, used in carving stone.

dént'-el, dent-il (Eng.), dén-tél'-lô (pl. dentelli) (Ital.) s. [Ital. from Latin denticulus=a little tooth.]

Arch.: The small square blocks or projections in the bed-mouldings of cornices in the Ionic, Corinthian, Composite, and occasionally Doric, orders. Their breadth should be half their height; and, as Vitruvius teaches, the interval [METOCHIE] between them two-thirds of their breadth. In the Grecian orders they are not used under modillions. (Quint.)

"The modillions, or dentelli, make a noble show by graceful projection."—Spectator.

dent-e-lí-on, dentilyon, s. [DANDELION.]

"Sere downis smal on dentillyon sprang."—Douglas: Virgil, 401, 14.

dén-tél'-lā, s. [Latin denticulus, dimin. of dens (genit. dentis)=a tooth.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, belonging to the order Cinchonaceæ. They are small creeping-plants, and are so called from the sides of the segments of the corolla being furnished with a small tooth. They are annuals, and have glabrous leaves and white flowers.

dēn-tēll'e, s. [Fr., from Lat. denticulus=a little tooth.]

Bookbinding: An ornamental tooling resembling notching or lace.

dēn-tēx, s. [Lat. dens (genit. dentis)=a tooth.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Acanthopterygious Fishes, belonging to the family Sparidae. In each jaw there is a row of strong, conic teeth. The dorsal fin is slightly emarginate. They are exceedingly voracious. They resemble the perch, frequenting shallows among rocks. Dentex vulgaris, also called the Four-toothed Sparus, is a large fish, sometimes as much as three feet long, and twenty to thirty pounds in weight. It is a native of the mouths of the rivers in Dalmatia and the Levant.

dēn-tī-cle, s. [Lat. denticulus, dimin. of dens (genit. dentis)=a tooth.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A small tooth, or projecting point.

2. Arch.: A dentel. (Ask.)

dēn-tic-u-lāte, dēn-tic-u-lāt-ēd, a. [Lat. denticulatus, from denticulus=a small tooth.]

1. Bot.: Having the margin very finely toothed.

2. Arch.: Formed into dentels.

3. Entom.: Having the margin very finely toothed.

"Anterior tibiae very finely denticulate."—Trans. Amer. Philos. Soc., vol. xiii., p. 289 (1873).

dēn-tic-u-lāte-lŷ, adv. [Eng. denticulate; -ly.]

In a denticulate manner.

denticulately-ciliated, a. Having the margin so finely toothed as to appear edged with ciliae or fine hairs.

denticulately-scabrous, a. Having rough denticulations, or very small teeth.

denticulately-serrated, a. Having the margin finely toothed, resembling the edge of a fine saw.

dēn-tic-u-lā-tion, s. [Lat. denticulatus.] The state or condition of being set with small teeth, or prominences resembling teeth, like those of a saw.

"He omits the denticulation of the edges of the bill, or those small oblique incisions made for the better retention of the prey."—Grew: Museum.

dēn-tī-cule (Eng.), dēn-tic-u-lūs (Lat.), s. [Lat., dim. of dens (genit. dentis)=a tooth.]

Arch.: The flat projecting part of a cornice on which dentels are cut.

—Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, iv. 1.

* To deny one's self: Not to gratify the appetite or desire; to refrain or abstain from.

"The best sign and fruit of denying ourselves, is mercy to others."—Sprat.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between to deny and to refuse: "To deny respects matters of fact or knowledge; to refuse matters of wish or request. We deny what immediately belongs to ourselves; we refuse what belongs to another. We deny as to the past; we refuse as to the future; we deny our participation in what has been; we refuse our participation in that which may be; to deny must always be expressly verbal; a refusal may sometimes be signified by actions or looks as well as words. A denial affects our veracity; a refusal affects our good nature . . . Deny is sometimes the act of unconscious agents; refuse is always a personal and intentional act."

(2) He thus discriminates between to deny and to disown: "Deny approaches nearest to the sense of disown when applied to persons; disown, that is, not to own, on the other hand, bears a strong analogy to deny when applied to things. In the first case deny is said with regard to one's knowledge of or connection with a person; disowning, on the other hand, is a term of larger import, including the renunciation of all relationship or social tie: the former is said of those who are not related; the latter of such only as are related. Peter denied our Savior; a parent can scarcely be justified in disowning his child let his vices be ever so enormous; a child can never disown its parent in any case without violating the most sacred duty. In the second case deny is said in regard to things that concern others as well as ourselves; disown only in regard to what is done by one's self or that in which one is personally concerned. A person denies that there is any truth in the assertion of another; he disowns all participation in any affair. We may deny having seen a thing; we may disown that we did it ourselves. Our veracity is often the only thing implicated in a denial; our guilt, innocence, or honor is implicated in what we disown. A witness denies what is stated as a fact; the accused party disowns what is laid to his charge. A denial is employed only for outward actions or events; that which can be related may be denied: disowning extends to whatever we can own or possess; we may disown our feelings, our name, our connections, and the like." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(3) For the difference between to deny and to contradict, see CONTRADICT; for that between to deny and to disavow, see DISAVOW.

dē-nŷ-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DENY.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

"It is a powerful and safe deobstruent in cachectic and hysteric cases."—Bishop Berkeley: Stris, § 6.

dē-ōc-u-lāte, v. t. [Pref. de=away, from, and oculatus=having eyes; oculus=an eye.] To deprive of the eyes or of sight; to blind.

dē-ō-dānd, s. [Lat. Deo dandum=to be given to God.]

Old Eng. Law: A personal chattel, which had been the immediate cause of the death of any person, as if a horse struck his keeper and so killed him, or if a tree fell and killed a passer-by. In these and such cases that which caused the death was to be given to God—that is, forfeited to the crown—to be sold or otherwise disposed of, and the proceeds applied to religious uses or charity. No deodand was due where an infant under the age of discretion was killed by a fall from a cart, or horse, or the like. The right to deodands within certain limits was frequently granted by the crown to individuals. Deodands were abolished in 1846.

dē-ō-dar, s. [Sansc. devadaru=divine tree.]

Bot.: Cedrus deodara, a large tree, attaining to the height of 100 ft., a native of the Himalayas, and similar in habit of growth to the Cedar of Lebanon, of which it is thought by some to be only a variety. Its timber is much valued and used in India. The name Deodar is also locally applied to other trees, especially Coniferae, in India, as at Simla, to the Cupressus torulosa. The C. deodara yields by exudation, and partly by heat, a kind of turpentine, resin, and pitch.

dē-ō-dāte, s. [Lat. Deo datum=a thing given to God.]

1. An offering to God.

"Whosoever their corban contained, wherein that blessed widow's deodate was laid up."—Hooker: Eccles. Polity, bk. vii., § 22.

2. A gift from God.

"He would be a deodate, a fit new year's gift for God to bestow on the world."—D'Oyly: Life of Saneraft, ch. ii.

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: Deoxidization, deoxidation.

dē-ōx-y-bēn-zōin, s. [Pref. de, and English oxy(gen), benzoin.]

Chem.: Phenyl-benzyl-ketone, $C_6H_5 \cdot CO \cdot CH_2 \cdot C_6H_5$. Obtained from benzoin, $C_6H_5 \cdot CH(OH) \cdot CO \cdot C_6H_5$, a ketonic alcohol reducing with zinc and hydrochloric acid; also by heating mono-brom-toluylene with water to 180° to 190°. It crystallizes out of alcohol in large tables, which melt at 55°, and sublime without decomposition. Heated with hydriodic acid it forms dibenzyl, $C_6H_5 \cdot CH_2 \cdot CH_2 \cdot C_6H_5$.

dē-ōx-y-gēn-āte, v. t. [Pref. de=away, from, and Eng. oxygenate (q. v.).]

Chem.: To deprive of oxygen; to deoxidate.

dē-ōx-y-gēn-āt-ēd, pa. par. or a. [DEOXYGENATE.]

dē-ōx-y-gēn-āt-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DEOXYGENATE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: Deoxidization; deoxidation.

dē-ōx-y-gēn-ā-tion, s. [Eng. deoxygenat(e); -ion.]

Chem.: The same as DEOXIDATION (q. v.).

dē-pā-gan-ize, v. t. [Pref. de=away, from, and Eng. paganize (q. v.).] To raise from a state of paganism.

B. Technically:

1. Law (of the form dependence): The state of depending, or being pending or undetermined.

"An action is said to be in dependence from the moment of citation till the final decision of the House of Lords."—Bell.

2. Logic (of the form dependency): That, the existence of which presupposes the existence of something else; something non-essential; an accident, a quality.

"Modes I call such complex ideas ... which are considered as dependencies or affections of substances."—Locke.

¶ Master of the dependences: A master of ceremonies for duels, an imaginary office which Meercraft, the Projector, in Ben Jonson's play, bestows on Everill.

"Master of the Dependences: a place Of my projection too, sir, and hath met Much opposition; but the State now sees That great necessity of it, as, after all Their writing and their speaking against duels, They have erected it."

Ben Jonson: The Devil's an Ass, iii. 1.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between dependence and reliance: "Dependence is the general term; reliance is a species of dependence: we depend either on persons or things; we rely on persons only: dependence serves for that which is immediate or remote; reliance serves for the future only. We depend upon a person for that which we are obliged to receive or led to expect from him: we rely upon a person for that which he has given us reason to expect from him. Dependence is an outward condition or the state of external circumstances; reliance is a state of the feelings with regard to others. We depend upon God for all that we have or shall have; we rely upon the word of man for that which he has promised to perform. We may depend upon a person's coming from a variety of causes; but we rely upon it only in reference to his avowed intention." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

"The difficulty will be to persuade the depositing of those lusts, which have, by I know not what fascination, so endeared themselves."—More: Decay of Christian Piety.

4. To lay in a place of preservation, to bury.

"Dryden wants a poor square foot of stone, to show where the ashes of one of the greatest poets on earth are deposited."—Garth.

5. To commit or intrust to anyone for safety.

"His most important papers had been deposited with the Tuscan minister."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ix.

6. To lodge or place with any person at interest, or as a pledge or security.

"Each company deposited securities worth 60,000 dollars."—London Daily Telegraph.

dē-pōs-it, *de-poost, *de-pos-ite, *de-post, s. [Latin depositum, neut. pa. par. of *depono=*to lay down, to deposit.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Anything deposited or laid down in a place.

2. Anything committed to the trust and care of another; anything deposited with another for safe-keeping.

3. A charge or trust.

"Thou, Tymothee, kepe the depoost."—Wycliffe: 1 Tim. vi. 20.

4. A pledge, a pawn; anything given as a security.

5. The state of a thing deposited for safe-keeping, pledged, or pawned.

"They had since Marseilles, and fairly left it; they had the other day the Valteline, and now have put it in deposit."—Bacon.

*6. A place where things are deposited.

II. Technically:

1. Banking: Money lodged in a bank for safe-keeping. Strictly speaking a deposit signifies only bonds or bills, or bullion deposited with a bank at interest, and not capable of being withdrawn except after some certain specified notice. [DEPOSIT-ACCOUNT.]

2. Commerce:

(1) Deposits of money are sometimes received by commercial companies with a view to employ it in their business. Interest of varying amounts will be given on deposits of this kind, according as the deposit is subject to withdrawal at a week's, or month's, or six months' notice. (Bithell.)

(2) Deposits of bonds, share-certificates, and other negotiable instruments, are often made for the sake of safety with a merchant or banker, in exchange for which a deposit-receipt is given. A commission, or some other form of remuneration, is usually paid by the depositor for the trouble and expense of the custody of such deposits. Similar documents are frequently placed in the hands of merchants and bankers as a security for loans made to the depositors. In these cases the deposit is made at the time the loan is advanced, and withdrawn when the loan is repaid. (Bithell.)

3. Law:

(1) Money deposited in the hands of another as a security for the performance of some engagement or contract, or as part payment.

(2) A naked bailment of goods to be kept for the bailor without recompense, and to be returned when the bailor shall require it.

bōll, bōy; pōut, jōw1; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, ag; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tīon, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -die, &c. = bēl, dēl.

4. Scots Law: The same as DEPOSITION (q. v.).
5. Geol.: A term applied to matter which has settled down after suspension in water, such as mud, sand, &c., and the shales and sandstones of older date. Deposits are usually distinguished by the positions in which they occur, or by the agencies concerned in their formation, as fluvial, lacustrine, estuary, marine, &c.

6. Pathol. & Physiol.: A structureless substance, separated from the blood or other fluid, as the typhoid, tuberculous, purulent, melanin, diphtheritic, and urinary deposits.

7. Crabb thus discriminates between deposit, pledge, and security: "The deposit has most regard to the confidence we place in another; the pledge has most regard to the security we give for ourselves; security is a species of pledge. A deposit is always voluntarily placed in the hands of an indifferent person; a pledge and security are required from the parties who are interested. A person may make a deposit for purposes of charity or convenience; he gives a pledge or security for a temporary accommodation, or the relief of a necessity. Money is deposited in the hands of a friend in order to execute a commission; a pledge is given as an equivalent for that which has been received; a security is given by way of security for the performance. A deposit may often serve the purpose of a security; but it need not contain anything so binding as either a pledge or a security; both of which involve a loss on the non-fulfillment of a certain contract. A pledge is given for matters purely personal; a security is given on behalf of another. Deposits are always transportable articles, consisting either of money, papers, jewels, or other valuables; a pledge is seldom pecuniary, but it is always some article of positive value, as estates, furniture, and the like, given at the moment of forming the contract; a security is always pecuniary, but it often consists of a promise, and not of any immediate resignation of one's property. Deposits are made and securities given by the wealthy; pledges are commonly given by those who are in distress. Deposit is seldom used but in the proper sense; pledge and security may be employed in a figurative application." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

8. In or on deposit: Committed or intrusted to any person for safe-keeping, or on interest.

deposit-account, s.

Banking: Money deposited with a banker at interest for some certain specified time. It is opposed to a current account, which can be added to or drawn upon at any time without notice to the bankers.

deposit-receipt, s.

Banking: A receipt or acknowledgment by a banker for money deposited with him for a certain specified time. [DEPOSIT, s., II. 2 (2).]

deposit-warrant, s.

Comm.: An acknowledgment, receipt, or certificate showing that certain commodities have been deposited in a certain place for safe-keeping, as security for a loan, or some other defined purpose. They are of two kinds:

(1) Special deposit-warrants, such as bills of lading, pawn-tickets, dock-warrants, certificates of deposits, which entitle the holder to claim certain specific goods, and not merely others of equal value in exchange for them. Documents of this kind, unless fraudulently issued, are among the best of securities, as they are always based on articles of value, and cannot be issued in excess of the goods actually deposited.

(2) General deposit-warrants: Warrants of this kind do not require that certain specific goods shall be delivered up in exchange for them. Such are contracts, promissory notes, bills, warrants for the delivery of coal, corn, pig-iron, &c. (Bithell.)

dē-pōs-ī-tār-ŷ, s. [Lat. depositarius; Fr. dépositaire; Sp., Port. & Ital. depositario, from Lat. deponere, pa. par. of depono = to lay down, to deposit.]

1. Ord. Lang.: One with whom anything is deposited for safe-keeping; a trustee, a guardian.

"... as were the best depositories of the traditional notions on constitutional and legal subjects."—Lewis: Cred. Early Roman Hist. (1855), ch. iv., § 5.

2. Law: One to whom goods are bailed to be returned to the bailer without recompense.

*dē-pōs-ī-tā-tion, s. [DEPOSIT.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The act of depositing for the purpose of safe-keeping.

"Instruments relative to the delivery of the Regalia of Scotland by the Earl Marischal, and their deposition in the crown room in the castle of Edinburgh, MDCCVII."—Inventories, p. 331.

2. Scots Law: A contract by which a subject belonging to one person is committed to the gratuitous charge of another, called the depository (q. v.), to be delivered up when demanded. A proper deposition is one where a special subject is deposited to be restored without alteration; an improper deposition is one where money or other fungibles are deposited to be returned in kind.

dē-pōs-ī-t-ēd, pa. par. or a. [DEPOSIT.]

dē-pōs-ī-t-īng, pr. par., a. & s. [DEPOSIT, v.]

2. That which is deposited; a deposit. [II. 2 (2).]

3. The act of depositing from a throne or high station; a divesting of sovereignty, or of office or dignity. [II. 1.]

4. The act of bearing witness under oath.

*5. A declaration or statement; evidence given. [II. 3.]

*6. The act of bringing forward or presenting; production, presentation.

"The influence of princes upon the dispositions of their courts needs not the deposition of their examples."—Montaigne: Devout Essays.

II. Technically:

1. Eccles.: The displacing or degrading of an unworthy clergyman from the ministry; degradation.

2. Geology:

(1) The act or process of depositing matter from a state of suspension in water; the state of being deposited.

"The deposition of rock matter is going forward less or more rapidly in all waters on the surface of the globe."—Page: Hand-book of Geol. Terms.

(2) That which is deposited; a deposit.

3. Law: The evidence or statement of a witness on oath or affirmation, signed by the justice or other duly authorized official before whom it is given; an affidavit.

"The depositions of witnesses duly taken before the committing justices are admissible in evidence on the trial of the accused, if it is proved that the person making such deposition is dead, or is so ill as not to be able to travel, and also that the deposition was taken in the presence of the accused, and that he or his counsel or attorney had a full opportunity of cross-examining the witness."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iv., ch. 21.

dē-pōs-ī-t-ive, a. [Eng. deposit; -ive.]

Med.: An epithet used by Sir Erasmus Wilson to express that condition of the membrane in which plastic lymph is exuded into the tissue of the derma, so as to give rise to the production of small hard elevations of the skin, or pimples. Under "depositive inflammation of the derma," he comprises strophulus, lichen, and prurigo.

dē-pōs-ī-tōr, s. [Lat.] One who, or that which, deposits; specially one who deposits money in a bank.

dē-pōs-ī-tōr-ŷ, s. [DEPOSITORY.]

1. A depository; one with whom anything is deposited.

"One who was ... the depository of the gravest secrets of state."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvii.

2. A place where anything is deposited for safe-keeping.

"There were, however, at Rome certain official depositories."—Lewis: Cred. Early Rom. Hist., ch. v., § 3.

dē-pōs-ī-t-ūm, s. [Lat. neut. of depositus, pa. par. of depono = to lay down, deposit.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A thing deposited; a deposit.

"The form used before the naturalization of the word 'deposit' in the English language, and continued by some writers after Bacon had set the example of using the modern form.

"They are laid up as a rich depositem in the hand of the Savior."—Culverwell: The Worth of Souls. (Trench: On some Def. in our Eng. Dict., p. 29.)

2. Rom. Law: A term used to denote that the commodity deposited was in due course to be returned in specie, i. e., the thing itself was to be returned. Goods deposited in wharfs, docks, and warehouses, are of this nature. (Bithell.)

dē-pōs-ī-t-ure, s. [Eng. deposit; -ure.] The act of depositing; deposition.

"By deposition in dry earths."—Browne: Urn Burial, ch. i.

dēp-ōt (t silent), s. [Fr. dépôt = a deposit, a magazine; O. Fr. depost, from Lat. depositum (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A place of deposit; a depository; a magazine; a storehouse; a place for the reception, storing, or warehousing of goods; a goods station.

"The islands of Guernsey and Jersey are the great deposits of this kingdom."—British Critic (1794), p. 203.

2. A railway station. (U. S. Colloq.)

II. Technically:

1. Military:

(1) A magazine where arms, ammunition, accoutrements, &c., are stored.

(2) A station where recruits are received and drilled.

(3) The headquarters of a regiment.

(4) That portion of a battalion which remains at the headquarters while the rest are on foreign service.

2. Fort.: A particular place at the tail of the trenches, out of the reach of the cannon of the place, where the troops generally assemble who are ordered to attack the outworks.

dē-pōul-sor*, s. [DEPULSE.] An expeller.

"The depositor and driver away of all evils."—Udall: Apophth. of Erasmus, p. 130. (Davies.)

dē-pōv-ēr-ish*, v. t. [Formed with prefix de, on analogy with impoverish (q. v.).] To impoverish.

"So is your power deposited."—Grafton: Richard II., an. 10.

dēp-ra-vāte*, v. t. [Lat. depravatus, pa. par. of depravo.] [DEPRAVE.] To malign, to disparage.

"Whereat the rest ... His Divine Truth with taunts doe deprave."—Davies: Holy Rood, p. 7. (Davies.)

dēp-ra-vā-tion, s. [Fr. dépravation; Sp. depravación; Ital. depravazione, from Lat. depravatio, from Lat. depravatus, pa. par. of depravo.] [DEPRAVE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of making bad or worse; corrupting, vitiating.

"... shall preach, declare, or speak anything in the derogation or depraving of the Book," &c.—Act of the Uniformity of Common Prayer, &c., 1 Eliz., c. 2.

dē-prāv-ing-lý, adv. [Eng. depraving; -ly.] In a depraving, corrupting, or vitiating manner.

dē-prāv-i-tý, s. [Eng. deprav(e); -ity.]

1. A state of corruption; a vitiated or deteriorated state.

"Nothing can show greater depravity of understanding than to delight in the show when the reality is wanting."—Johnson.

2. Wickedness, profligacy; an utter absence of morality or good principles.

"The depravity of this man has passed into a proverb."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iv.

† Crabb thus discriminates between depravity, depravation, and corruption: "The term depravity characterizes the thing as it is; the terms depravation and corruption designate the making or causing it to be so: depravity therefore excludes the idea of any cause; depravation always carries us to the cause or external agency: hence we may speak of depravity as natural, but we speak of depravation as the result of circumstances: there is a depravity in man which nothing but the grace of God can correct; the introduction of obscenity on the stage tends greatly to the depravation of morals; bad company tends to the corruption of a young man's morals. Depravity or depravation implies crookedness, or a distortion from the regular course; corruption implies a dissolution as it were in the component parts of bodies. Cicero says (de Finibus, ii.) that depravity is applicable only to the mind and heart; but we say a depraved taste, and depraved humors in regard to the body. A depraved taste loathes common food, and longs for that which is hurtful. Corruption is the natural process by which material substances are disorganized. . . . A judgment not sound or right is depraved; a judgment debased by that which is vicious is corrupted. What is depraved requires to be reformed; what is corrupted requires to be purified. Depravity has most regard to internal and excessive disorders; corruption is best applied to those objects to which common usage has annexed the epithets of right, regular, fine, &c., and corruption to those which may be characterized by the epithets of sound, pure, innocent, or good. Hence we prefer to say depravity of mind and corruption of heart; depravity of principle and corruption of sentiment or feeling: a depraved character; a corrupt example, a corrupt influence. . . . The last thing worthy of notice respecting the two words depravity and corruption, is that the former is used for man in his moral capacity; but the latter for man in a political capacity; hence we speak of human depravity, but the corruption of government." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dē-prē-ca-ble, a. [Lat. deprecabilis, from deprecor=to deprecate (q. v.).] That is or ought to be deprecated.

"I look upon the temporal destruction of the greatest king as far less deprecable than the eternal damnation of the meanest subject."—Eikon Basilike.

dē-prē-cāte, v. t. & i. [Lat. deprecatus, pa. par. of deprecor=to pray against; de=away, from, and precor=to pray.]

1. To pray against; to pray deliverance from; to endeavor to avert by prayer.

"Among the three evils he petitioned to be delivered from, he might have deprecated greater evils."—Baker: Reflections on Learning.

2. To argue or plead earnestly against; to express strong disapproval of; to condemn.

3. To implore mercy of.

"Much he advis'd them all, Ulysses most To deprecate the chief, and save the host."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, ix. 235, 236.

B. Intrans.: To pray earnestly, to request, to ask pardon. (Ash.) dē-prē-cāt-ēd, pa. par. or a. [DEPRECATE.]

dē-prē-cāt-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DEPRECATE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of praying against; a strong disapproval, a deprecation.

dē-prē-cāt-ing-lý, adv. [English deprecating; -ly.] In a deprecating or deprecatory manner; with deprecations.

dē-prē-cā-tion, s. [Lat. deprecatio; Fr. déprécat; Sp. deprecación; Ital. deprecazione, from Lat. deprecatus, pa. par. of deprecor.]

1. The act of praying against or seeking to avert by praying.

"I, with leave of speech implor'd And humble deprecation, thus replied."
Milton: P. L., viii. 377, 378.

*2. A prayer against evil.

"Sternutation they generally conceived to be a good sign, or a bad one; and so, upon this motion, they commonly used a gratulation for the one, and a deprecation for the other."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

*3. An earnest entreaty; an excuse, an excusing.

*4. An imprecation.

"We may with too much justice apply to him the scriptural deprecation."—Gilpin.

5. An earnest arguing or pleading against; a strong condemnation or disapproving.

dē-prē-cā-tive, a. [Fr. déprécatif; Ital. & Sp. deprecativo; Lat. deprecativus, from deprecatus, pa. par. of deprecor.] Deprecating, deprecatory.

"The form of absolution in the Greek Church is deprecative: 'May God absolve you.'"—Staunton: Ecclesiastical Dictionary, p. 254.

dē-prē-cāt-ive-lý, adv. [Eng. deprecative; -ly.] In a deprecative or deprecatory manner; deprecatingly.

"Looking up to him deprecatively, he said, . . ."
P. R. Drummond: Perthshire in Bygone Days (1879), ch. xiv., p. 80.

dē-prē-cā-tōr, s. [Lat.]

1. One who prays against or seeks to avert evil by prayer.

2. One who earnestly argues or pleads against; one who strongly condemns or disapproves.

dē-prē-cā-tōr-ý, a. & s. [Lat. deprecatorius.]

A. As adj.: Serving to or tending to deprecation; having the form of a deprecation; deprecative.

"Bishop Fox sent many humble and deprecatory letters to the Scottish king to appease him."—Bacon.

B. As subst.: A deprecation.

"Full of deprecatories and apologetics."—North: Examen, p. 343. (Davies.)

dē-prē-çl-āte (or çl as shí), v. t. & i. [Lat. deprecativus, pa. par. of depreto=to deprecate; de=away, from, and pretium=price; Fr. déprécier, dépriser.]

A. Transitive:

1. To lower the value or price of; to bring down in price.

"... depreciated paper, which he had fraudulently substituted for silver."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxxiii.

2. To represent as of less value or merit; to disparage, to undervalue, to decry, to underrate.

"They both took every method to depreciate the merit of each other."—Goldsmith: On Polite Learning, ch. vii.

3. To take away from the value of.

B. Intrans.: To fall in value or price; to become of less worth.

† For the difference between to depreciate and to disparage, see DISPARAGE.

dē-prē-çl-āt-ēd (or çl as shí), pa. par. or a. [DEPRECATE.]

dē-prē-çl-āt-ing (or çl as shí), pr. par., a. & s. [DEPRECATE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of lowering in value, price, or estimation; deprecation.

dē-prē-çl-ā-tion (or çl as shí), s. [Fr. dépréciation, from Lat. deprecativus, pa. par. of depreto=to deprecate.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of depreciating, lowering, or lessening in value or price.

"In consequence of an artificial depreciation of the currency."—Rogers: Political Economy, p. 300.

2. The act or state of becoming depreciated or lowered in value or price.

3. The act of depreciating, disparaging, underrating, or decrying.

II. Comm., Finance, &c.: The diminution or falling off in value of coins, bullion, or of a paper currency.

† "Depreciation is often confounded with debasement, especially when used with reference to the coinage. But debasement is the wilful act of a dishonest government, or of dishonest persons: while depreciation, whether of coin, bullion, or commodities, is usually altogether beyond human control. As the price, or value, of a thing is the ratio in which that thing exchanges for some other thing, it is obvious that if any one commodity becomes unusually abundant in the market, the ratio in which it exchanges with all other commodities is altered, and the same may be said if the supply be abnormally scant. When, in the course of these fluctuations, the quantity of any commodity given in exchange is greater than usual, the value of that commodity is said to be depreciated." (Bithell: Counting-house Dictionary.)

dē-prē-çl-āt-ive (or çl as shí), a. [Fr. déprécatif.] Tending to depreciate or lower in value, price, or estimation.

dē-prē-çl-ā-tōr (or çl as shí), s. [Lat.] One who depreciates.

dē-prē-çl-ā-tōr-ý (or çl as shí), a. [Formed as if from a Lat. depretilorius, from depretilatus.] Tending to depreciate; depreciative.

dē-prē-da-ble, a. [Eng. depred(ate); -able.] Liable to depredation.

"Made less deprecable."—Bacon: On Learning, bk. iv., ch. 2.

dē-prē-dāte, v. t. & i. [Latin deprædatus, pa. par. of deprædare=to plunder, to pillage; de (intens.), and prædare=to plunder; præda=booty, plunder; Fr. dépréder; Sp. depredar; Ital. depredare.]

A. Transitive:

†1. To rob, to plunder, to pillage.

*2. To waste, to spoil.

"It maketh the substance of the body more solid and compact, and so less apt to be consumed and depredated by the spirits."—Bacon.

*3. To eat up, to consume.

*B. Intrans.:

† To rob, plunder, pillage.

dē-prē-dāt-ēd, pa. par. or a. [DEPREDATE.]

dē-prē-dāt-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DEPREDATE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of plundering or pillaging; depredation.

dē-prē-dā-tion, s. [Lat. deprædatio, from deprædatus, pa. par. of deprædare=to depredate; Fr. déprédation; Sp. depredación; Ital. depredazione.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of plundering, pillaging, or laying waste; plunder, pillage, robbery.

"The land had never been before so free from robberies and depredations as through his reign."—Wotton.

2. A waste; a consumption; a wearing away or despoiling.

"... such depredations and changes of sea and land."—Woodward.

II. Scots Law: A forcible or violent driving away of cattle and other beasts. [HERSHIP.]

† Crabb thus discriminates between degradation and robbery: "Depredation signifies the act of spoiling or laying waste, as well as taking away."

Robbery, on the other hand, signifies simply the removal or taking away from another by violence.

Every degradation, therefore, includes a robbery, but not vice versa. A degradation is always attended with mischief to some one, though not always with advantage to the depredator; but the robber always calculates on getting something for himself.

Depredations are often committed for the indulgence of private animosity; robbery is always committed from a thirst for gain. Depredation is either the public act of a community or the private act of individuals; robbery mostly the private act of individuals. Depredations are committed wherever the occasion offers, in open or covert places; robberies are committed either on the persons or houses of individuals. In former times neighboring states used to commit frequent degradations on each other, even when not in a state of open hostility; robberies were, however, then less frequent than at present. Depredation is used in the proper and bad sense, for animals as well as for men; robbery may be employed figuratively and in the indifferent sense. Birds are great depredators in the cornfields: bees may be said to plunder or rob the flowers of their sweets." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

1. One who commits depredations; a plunderer, a devourer.

(2) The same as COUCHING (q. v.).

* 3. Math.: The reducing of an equation to a lower degree, as a biquadratic to a cubic, &c., by dividing each side by a common factor.

4. Gunn.: The lowering of the muzzle of a gun so that the shot shall be thrown under the point-blank line.

5. Meteor.: A fall in, or low state of, the barometer, indicative of bad weather.

† The fall of the barometer is produced by diminished pressure in the atmosphere, which renders a column of it, able a little before to support say 30 inches of mercury, incapable of sustaining perhaps more than 29 $\frac{1}{2}$. For such diminished pressure meteorologists often use the word depression. In most localities it immediately heralds stormy weather, and is made known by the barometer, while yet the maximum depression is at a considerable distance. The connection between a storm and diminished pressure is this: When the latter occurs, a movement of the wind impelled by gravitation takes place from every adjacent area of over-pressure, and the nearer these areas are the steeper are the gradients, and consequently the more violent the wind. With regard to its direction, it does not move in a straight line to the vortex, but flows in spirally, sometimes making a cyclone (q. v.). The distribution temporarily or permanently of these areas of high and low pressure over the world is the key that unlocks the mystery of the weather. [PRESSURE (Meteor.). See also ISOBAR.] (Buchan: Meteorol.)

"The meteorological department signals indications of a fresh depression at the mouth of the Channel."—London Daily Telegraph.

† (1) Angle of depression: The angle by which any straight line drawn from the eye to an object dips below the horizon. [DIP, s.]

(2) Depression of the pole:

Navig.: The sinking of the polar star toward the horizon as a person moves toward the equator: a phenomenon arising from the spherical figure of the earth. [DEPRESS, q.]

(3) Depression of the sun, or a star:

Astron.: [DEPRESSION, II. 1 (2).]

(4) Depression, or dip, of the horizon:

Navig.: The depression or dipping of the visible horizon below the true horizontal plane, arising from the eye of the observer not being placed on the same level with the sea, but at some distance above it. [DIP, s.]

† For the difference between depression and dejection, see DEJECTION.

dě-prěs-sive, a. [Eng. depress; -ive.]

* 1. Lit.: Able or tending to depress or press down.

"We must pronounce that substance to be ponderous depressive, and earthy."—Warton: Notes on Milton.

2. Fig.: Depressing; causing depression or lowness of spirits.

"Ev'n where the keen depressive north descends."

Thomson: Britannia, 273.

† dě-prěs-sive-něss, s. [Eng. depressive; -ness.]

The quality of being depressive; depression.

dē-priv'-a-ble, a. [Eng. depriv(e); -able.] That may be deprived, deposed, or dispossessed; liable to deprivation.

"Upon surmise they gather, that the persons that enjoy them possess them wrongfully, and are deprivable at all hours."—Hooker: Eccles. Polity, v., § 81.

dē-ri-vā-tion, s. [Low Lat. deprivatio, from Lat. de=away, from, and privatio=a depriving; privo=to deprive.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of depriving or taking away anything.
"It is to these, then, that the deprivation of ancient polite learning is principally to be ascribed."—Goldsmith: Polite Learning, ch. ii.
2. The act of depriving of or deposing from an office. [II.]
"If the oaths so tendered are refused, let deprivation follow."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.
3. The state of being deprived; loss, want.
"Fools whose end is destruction, and eternal deprivation of being."—Bentley.
4. A state of want or destitution; hardship, privation.

II. English Eccl. Law: An ecclesiastical censure, whereby a clergyman is deprived of his parsonage, vicarage, or other spiritual promotion or dignity. It is of two kinds: a. beneficium and ab officio. By the first the clergyman is deprived of his preferment or living; by the second he is deprived of his orders or degraded (q. v.).

dē-priv'e, *de-priv-en, *de-priv'e, v. t. [Low Lat. deprivo; from Lat. de=away, from, and privo=to deprive; O. Fr. depriver.] [PRIVATE.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To take away from, to bereave (followed by o before that which is taken away).
"It was seldom that anger deprived him of power over himself."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vii.
- *2. Used absolutely: to bereave of an inheritance, to dispossess.

"And permit

The curiosity of nations to deprive me."

Shakesp.: King Lear, i. 2.

*3. To take away.

"Love is a jewel (some say) inestimable,
But, hung at the ear, deprives our own sight."
Beaumont & Fletcher: Maid in the Mill, iv. 3.

4. To hinder, to debar; to shut out from.

"The ghosts rejected, are th' unhappy crew Depriv'd of sepulchers and fun'ral due."
Dryden: Virgil's Æneid, vi. 445, 446.

¶ It is used in this sense by Milton, without the preposition of.

"From his face I shall be hid, depriv'd His blessed countenance."
Milton: P. L., xi. 316, 317.

*5. To injure, to destroy, to affect.

"Melancholy hath deprived their judgments."—Reginald Scot.

*6. To prevent, to avert, to keep off.

II. Eng. Eccl. Law: To divest of an ecclesiastical dignity or preferment; to punish by deprivation.

"If on the first of February, 1690, he still continued obstinate, he was to be finally deprived."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between to deprive, to debar, and to abridge: "Deprive conveys the idea of either taking away that which one has, or withholding that which one may have; debar conveys the idea only of withholding; abridge conveys that also of taking away. Depriving is a coercive measure; debar and abridge are merely acts of authority. We are deprived of that which is of the first necessity; we are debarred of privileges, enjoyments, opportunities, &c.; we are abridged of comforts, pleasures, conveniences, &c. Criminals are deprived of their liberty; their friends are in extraordinary cases debarred the privilege of seeing them; thus men are often abridged of their comforts in consequence of their own faults. Deprivation and debarment sometimes arise from things as well as persons; abridging is always the voluntary act of conscious agents. Misfortunes sometimes deprive a person of the means of living; the poor are often debarred, by their poverty, of the opportunity to learn their duty; it may sometimes be necessary to abridge young people of their pleasures when they do not know how to make a good use of them. Religion teaches men to be resigned under the severest deprivations; it is painful to be debarred the society of those we love, or to abridge others of any advantage which they have been in the habit of enjoying." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between to despise and to bereave, see BEREAVE.

dē-priv'd, pa. par. & a. [DEPRIVE.]

dē-priv'e-mēt, s. [Eng. deprive; -ment.] The act of depriving; the state of being deprived; deprivation.

"The widower may lament and condole the unhappiness of so many deprivements."—Ricaut: Greek Church, p. 306.

dē-priv'-ēr, s. [Eng. depriv(e); -er.] One who deprives or bereaves.

"Depriver of those solid joys Which sack creates."

Cleveland: Poems, &c., p. 38.

dē-priv'-īng, pr. par., a. & s. [DEPRIVE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of bereaving, dispossessing, or deposing; deprivation.

dē-prōs'-trāte, a. [Pref. de (intens.), and Eng. prostrate (q. v.).] Low, mean, base.

depth, depthe, s. [Formed from deep, with suff. -th; cog. with Icel. dýpt, dýpdh; Dut. diepte.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) Deepness; the measure of anything from the surface, or highest point, downward.

"As for men, they had buildings in many places higher than the depth of the water."—Bacon.

(2) The measure of anything from the anterior to the posterior part, or from the front to the rear. [II. 2.]

(3) A deep place.

"A spirit raised from depth of underground."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. II., i. 2.

(4) Specifically: The sea, the ocean (generally used in the plural).

"Darknessis wren on the face of depthe."—Wycliffe: Gen. i. 2.

2. Figuratively:

(1) The innermost recess; the furthest, or extreme part.

"In the eternal depths of heaven."

Byron: Heaven and Earth, i. 1.

(2) The middle or height of any season; the darkest, or the stillest part.

"The earl of Newcastle, in the depth of winter, rescued the city of York from the rebels."—Clarendon.

(3) Immensity, infinity.

"O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God."—Romans xi. 33.

(4) Profoundness, profundity, extent of penetration.

(5) Abstruseness, obscurity; something abstruse or obscure, and not easily understood.

"There are greater depths and obscurities in an elaborate and well-written piece of nonsense, than in the most abstruse tract of school divinity."—Addison: Whig Exam.

(6) Profoundness, or extent of learning or experience.

"While mixt in thee combine the charm of youth,
The force of manhood, and the depth of age."

Thomson: Seasons; Autumn, 940, 941.

* (7) The full extent; the limit, the end.

"I was come to the depth of my tale."—Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 4.

II. Technically:

*2. Mil.: The depth of a squadron or battalion is the number of men in a file from front to rear.

*3. Naut.: The depth of a sail is the extent of the square sails from the head-rope to the foot-rope, or the length of the after-leach of a staysail or a boom-sail.

¶ Out of one's depth:

(1) Lit.: In water sufficiently deep to drown one.

(2) Fig.: Confused, puzzled; beyond one's comprehension or knowledge.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between depth and profundity: "These terms do not differ merely in their derivation; but depth is indefinite in its signification; and profundity is a positive and considerable degree of depth. Moreover the word depth is applied to objects in general; profundity is confined in its application to moral objects: thus we speak of the depth of the sea, or the depth of a person's learning; but his profundity of thought." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) depth-gauge, s. A graduated measuring-tool, or one capable of being set to a measure, to determine the depth of a hole.

dēph'-en, v. t. [Eng. depth; -en.] To make deep, to deepen.

dēph'-en-īng, pr. par. or a. [DEPTHEN.]

deepening-tool, s.

1. A countersinker for deepening a hole.
2. A watchmaker's tool for gauging the distances of pivot-holes in movement-plates. (Knight.)

dē-pū'sed, pa. par. or a. [DEPULSE.]

dē-pū'-sēr, *de-poul-sour, s. [English depuls(e); -er.] One who or that which drives or thrusts away.

dē-pū'-sion, s. [Lat. depulsio, from depulsus, pa. par. of depello.] A driving or thrusting away.

"To parney for his owne security, and their depulsion."—Speed: Henry VII., bk. ix., ch. xx., § 28.

dē-pū'-sōr-ē, *dē-pū'-sōr-le, a. [Eng. depuls(e); -ory.]

1. Driving or thrusting away.

2. Deprecatory, averting.

"In making supplication and prayer unto the gods by the means of certain depulsive sacrifices."—P. Holland: Ammianus Marcellinus (1609).

depulye, v. t. [Fr. dépouiller, from Lat. de-spoliare.] To spoil; to plunder.

"They depulye the mekil byng of quhete,
And in thare byk it caryis al and sum."

Douglas: Virgil's Æneid, 113, 49.

dēp'-u-rāte, v. t. [Low Lat. depuratus, pa. par. of depuo = to clear, purify; de (intens.), and puro=to purify; Fr. dépurer.] To purify, to clear, to cleanse or free from impurities.

"Chemistry enabling us to depurate bodies."—Boyle.

B. Intrans.: To mock, to laugh to scorn, to ridicule.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between deride, to mock, to ridicule, to banter, and to gally: "Derision and mockery evince themselves by the outward actions in general; ridicule consists more in words than actions; rallying and bantering almost entirely in words. Deride is not so strong a term as mock, but much stronger than ridicule. There is always a mixture of hostility in derision and mockery; but ridicule is frequently unaccompanied with any personal feeling of displeasure. Derision is often deep, not loud; it discovers itself in suppressed laughs, contemptuous sneers, or gesticulations, and cutting expressions; mockery is mostly noisy and outrageous; it breaks forth in insulting buffoonery, and is sometimes accompanied with personal violence; the former consists of real but contemptuous laughter; the latter often of affected laughter and grimace. Derision and mockery are always personal; ridicule may be directed to things as well as to persons. Derision and mockery are a direct attack on the individual, the latter still more so than the former; ridicule is as often used in writing as in personal intercourse. Derision and mockery are practiced by persons in any station; ridicule is mostly used by equals. A person is derided and mocked for that which is offensive as well as apparently absurd or extravagant; he is ridiculed for what is apparently ridiculous. Our Savior was exposed both to the derision and mockery of his enemies; they derided him for what they dared to think his false pretensions to a superior mission; they mocked him by plating a crown of thorns, and acting the farce of royalty before him. Rally and banter, like derision and mockery, are altogether personal acts, in which application they are very analogous to ridicule. Ridicule is the most general term of the three; we often rally and banter by ridiculing. There is more exposure in ridiculing, reproof in rallying, and provocation in bantering. A person may be ridiculed on account of his eccentricities; he is rallied for his defects; he is bantered for accidental circumstances: the two former actions are often justified by some substantial reason; the latter is an action as puerile as it is unjust, it is a contemptible species of mockery. Self-conceit and extravagant follies are oftentimes best corrected by good-natured ridicule; a man may deserve sometimes to be rallied for his want of resolution." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = shün. -tious, -cious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, dəl.

dêr-ric, dêr-ric, dêr-ich, s. [For etym. see def. i. 1.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. The name of a celebrated hangman of Tyburn, whose name frequently occurs in plays of the beginning of the seventeenth century.

"He rides circuit with the devil, and Derrick must be his host, and Tyburne the inn at which he will light."—Decker: Belman of London (1616).

*2. A common hangman.

*3. A gallows.

"Pox o' the fortune-teller! Would Derrick had been his fortune seven years ago!—to cross my love thus."—Puritan, iv., 1. Suppl. to Sh., ii. 602.

4. In the same sense as II.

II. Machinery:

1. A form of hoisting machine. The peculiar feature of a derrick, which distinguishes it from some other forms of hoisting-machines, is that it has a boom stayed from a central post, which may be anchored, but is usually stayed by guys. A derrick has one leg, a shears two, and a gin three. A crane has a post and jib. A win or whim has a vertical axis on which a rope winds. The capstan has a vertical drum for the rope, and is rotated by bars.

The windlass has a horizontal barrel, and is rotated by hand-spikes. The winch has a horizontal barrel, and is frequently by the means of winding up the tackle-rope of the derrick; it is rotated by cranks. The crab is a portable winch, and has cranks. The derrick is more commonly used in this country than in Europe, and has attained what appears to be maximum effectiveness with a given weight. Two spars, three guys, and two sets of tackle—one for the jib and one for the load—complete the apparatus, except the winch, crab, or capstan for hoisting. The invention is nautical, the original being the sailor's contrivance, made of a spare topmast or a boom, and the appropriate tackle. Such are used in masting, putting in boilers and engines, and hoisting heavy merchandise on board or ashore.

2. The derrick-crane is a combination of the two devices, as its name imports, having facility for hoisting and also for swinging the load horizontally.

dêr-rin, s. [Etym. unknown.] A broad, thick cake or loaf of oat or barley meal, or of pease and barley meal mixed.

And yet more proud the descant rung,"
Scott: Lord of the Isles, i. 2.

2. A treble, an accompaniment.

"Nay, now you are too flat,
And mar the concord with too harsh a descant," Shakesp.: Two Gent. of Verona, i. 2.

*3. A discourse, a disputation, a discussion, a series of comments.

"And look you get a prayer-book in your hand,
And stand between two churchmen, good my lord;
For on that ground I'll make a holy descant," Shakesp.: Richard III., iii. 7.

II. Mus.: The addition of a part or parts to a tenor or subject. This art, the forerunner of modern counterpoint and harmony, grew out of the still earlier art of diaphony or the organum. It may be said to have come into existence at the end of the eleventh or beginning of the twelfth century. Originally, as had been previously the case with diaphony it consisted of two parts only, but later in its life developed into maquets and various other forms of composition. The real difference between diaphony and descant seems to have been that the former was rarely, if ever, more complicated than note against note, whereas descant made use of the various proportionate value of notes. [DIAPHONY.] Double descant is where the parts are contrived in such a manner that the treble may be made the bass, and the bass the treble. (Stainer & Barrett, &c.) dêg'-cânt, dêg'-cânt, v. i. [DESCANT, s.]

dě-gěrt'* (2), s. [DESSERT.]

dě-gěrt' (3), dě-ser-te* (2), des-ser-te*, s. [O. Fr. deserte=a thing deserved, merit, pa. par. of deservir = to deserve.]

1. A deserving; that which deserves or gives a claim to either reward or punishment equal or proportionate to the acts or conduct of the agent.

"All without desert have frowned on me."
Shakespeare: Richard III., ii. 1.

2. Merit, claim to reward or honor.

"Yet I confess that often ere this day,
When I have heard your king's desert recounted, Mine ear hath tempted judgment to desire."
Shakespeare: Henry VI., Pt. III., iii. 3.

3. That which is deserved or merited.

"Render to them their desert."—Ps. xxviii. 4.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between desert, merit, and worth: "Desert is taken for that which is good or bad; merit for that which is good only. We deserve praise or blame; we merit a reward. The desert consists in the action, work, or service performed; the merit has regard to the character of the agent or the nature of the action. The idea of value, which is prominent in the signification of the term merit, renders it closely allied to that of worth. The man of merit looks to the advantages which shall accrue to himself; the man of worth is contented with the consciousness of what he possesses in himself; merit respects the attainments or qualifications of a man; worth respects his moral qualities only. It is possible therefore for a man to have great merit and little or no worth. He who has great powers and uses them for the advantage of himself or others is a man of merit; he only who does good from a good motive is a man of worth. We look for merit among men in the discharge of their several offices or duties; we look for worth in their social capacities. From these words are derived the epithets deserved and merited, in relation to what we receive from others; and deserving, meritorious, worthy, and worth, in regard to what we possess in ourselves; a treatment is deserved or undeserved; reproofs are merited or unmerited; the harsh treatment of a master is easier to be borne when it is undeserved than when it is deserved; the reproaches of a friend are very severe when unmerited. A laborer is deserving on account of his industry; an artist is meritorious on account of his professional abilities; a citizen is worthy on account of his benevolence and uprightness. The first person deserves to be well paid and encouraged; the second merits the applause which is bestowed on him; the third is worthy of confidence and esteem from all men. Betwixt worthy and worth there is this difference, that the former is said of the intrinsic and moral qualities, the latter of extrinsic accidents: a worthy man possesses that which calls for the esteem of others; but a man is worth the property which he can call his own." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dě-gěrt'-ěr, dě-gěrt'-ěr*, s. [Fr. déserteur, from désertier=to desert.]

dě-sic-cāte, a. [Lat. desiccatus.] Dried up.

"As in bodies desiccate by heat or age."—Bacon: Life and Death, § 842.

děs-ic-cāt-ēd, pa. par. or a. [DESICCATE, v.]

děs-ic-cāt-īng, pr. par., a. & s. [DESICCATE, v.]
A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act or process of drying up; desiccation.

děs-ic-cāt-ion, s. [Lat. desiccatio, from desicco, pa. par. of desicco.]

1. The evaporation or drying off of the aqueous portion of bodies. It is practiced with fruit, meat, milk, vegetable extracts, and many other matters. It is usually done by a current of heated dry air, and as such may be considered as distinguished from evaporators, so called, to which furnace heat or steam heat is applied.

2. The state or quality of becoming desiccated.
"If the spirits issue out of the body, there followeth desiccation, induration, and consumption."—Bacon.

desiccation cracks, s. pl.

Geol.: When clay and clayey beds are desiccated by the sun's heat and become dry, they shrink and crack in all directions. Were such beds to be overlaid by a new deposit of mud or other soft matter, portions of it would enter these cracks, and the two strata, on being separated (after consolidation) would present—the lower, the "mold," and the upper, the "casts" of these fissures. Such appearances are frequent among the strata of all formations, are known as desiccation cracks, and are not to be confounded with joints, cleavage, and similar phenomena. (Page.)

dě-sic-cā-tive, a. & s. [Eng. desiccat(e); -ive.]

A. As adj.: Having the property or quality of desiccating; tending to desiccate; desiccant.

"They are of a desiccative or drying nature."—Ferrand: Love of Melancholy, p. 358 (1640).

B. As subst.: The same as DESICCANT, s. (q. v.)

"The ashes of a hedgehog are said to be a great desiccative of fistulas."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., No. 979.

děs-ic-cā-tōr, s. [Eng. desiccat(e); -or.]

Chem.: An apparatus used to dry chemical substances which are decomposed by heat, or by being exposed in a moist state to the action of the air. It consists of a vessel containing either sulphuric acid, chloride of calcium, or some other substance which has a great affinity for water; over this is supported the vessel, or the porous plate containing the substance to be dried. The whole is covered by a bell jar resting on a glass plate, the edges of the jar being ground perfectly smooth and covered with grease so as to make the apparatus air-tight.

dě-si-de, v. i. [According to Ash, from de=down, and sedeo=to sit; but it may perhaps be a mistake for decide (q. v.).] To sink down, to fall down.

dě-sid-ēr-a-ble, a. [Lat. desiderabilis.] To be desired; worthy or deserving of desire.

"And most men verily are of the same nature, passing good and desirable things."—Holland: Plutarch, p. 124.

dě-sid-ēr-āte, a. [Lat. desideratus, pa. par. of desidero=to desire (q. v.).] Desired, longed for, wanted.

"These are the parts which in the knowledge of medicine are desiderate."—Bacon: On Learning, iv. ii.

dě-sid-ēr-āte, v. t. [DESIDERATE, a.] To desire, to long for, to want, to miss, to feel the loss or absence of.

"We desiderate, in the first place, the civic title of the worthy alderman."—Edinburgh Review, May, 1811, p. 123.

dě-sid-ēr-ā-tion, s. [Lat. desideratio, from desideratus, pa. par. of desidero.]

1. The act of desiring; desiring, longing for, missing, or regretting; desire, regret.

"Desideration is inflicted by reminiscences."—W. Taylor.

*2. That which is desiderated; a desideratum.

dě-sid-ēr-a-tive, a. & s. [Lat. desiderativus.]

A. As adjective:

Ord. Lang. & Gram.: Having or expressing desire.

"The verbs called deponent, desiderative, frequentative, inceptive, &c."—Beattie: Moral Science, pt. i., ch. i., § 3.

B. As substantive:

*1. Ord. Lang.: An object of desire or desideration; a desideratum.

2. Gram.: A verb formed from another, and expressive of a desire to do the action implied in the primitive verb.

dě-sid-ēr-ā-tūm (pl. dě-sid-ēr-ā-ta), s. [Lat. neut. sing. of desideratus, pa. par. of desidero=to desire.] Anything desired, wished for, or wanted; a thing of which we feel the loss or absence; a state of things to be desired.

"A 'good' hater is still a desideratum in the world."—Carlyle: Essays; Burns.

dě-sid-ēr-ŷ, s. [Lat. desiderium, from desidero=to desire.] Desire.

"My name is True Love, of cardinal desirery, the very exemplary."
Chaucer: Ballads; Craft of Lovers.

dě-sid-ŷ-ōse, dě-sid-ŷ-ōus, a. [Lat. desidiosus, from desidia=sloth, idleness.] Idle, lazy, slothful.

dě-sid-ŷ-ōus-nēss, s. [Eng. desidious; -ness.] Sloth, laziness, idleness.

"The Germans perceiving our desidiousness and negligence."—Leland: To Sec. Cromwell in Wood's Athenae Oxon.

dě-sight-ment (gh silent), s. [Pref. de=away, from; Eng. sight (q. v.), and suff. -ment.] The act of making unsightly or disfiguring.

"Substitute jury-masts at whatever desightment or damage in risk."—London Times (in Ogilvie).

dě-sign (g silent), v. t. & i. [Fr. designer=to describe, desiner=to design, to draw; Lat. designo=to mark, to denote; de=down, and signo=to mark; signum=a mark, a sign.]

A. Transitive:

I. Lit.: To draw, to delineate by drawing; to sketch in visible outline, to plan.

"Thus while they speed their pace, the prince designs the new elected seat, and draws the lines."—Dryden.

II. Figuratively:

1. To denote, to mark or point out.

"There must be ways of designing and knowing the person to whom this regal power of right belongs."—Locke.

2. To project, to plan.

"We are to observe whether the picture or outlines be well drawn, or, as more elegant artists term it, well designed."—Wotton.

3. To purpose, to intend, to have in contemplation.

4. To devote, to set apart for a purpose.

"But if a sweeter voice, and one designed A blessing to my country and mankind, Reclaim the wandering thousands," Cowper: Expostulation, 726-28.

(1) Followed by for or as before the object intended.

(2) Followed by to.

"He was born to the inheritance of a splendid fortune; he was designed to the study of the law."—Dryden.

B. Intransitive:

1. To point out, to indicate.

"Meet me to-morrow where the master And this fraternity shall design."
Beaumont and Fletcher.

2. To plan, to intend, to purpose, to have in view.

*3. To direct one's course; to start for.

"From this city she designed for Collin [Cologne]."—Evelyn.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to design, to intend, to mean, and to purpose: "Design and purpose are terms of higher import than intend and mean, which are in familiar use; the latter still more so than the former. The design embraces many objects; the purpose consists of only one; the former supposes something studied and methodical, it requires reflection; the latter supposes something fixed and determinate, it requires resolution. A design is attainable; a purpose is steady. We speak of the design as it regards the thing conceived; we speak of the purpose as it regards the temper of the person. Men of a sanguine or aspiring character are apt to form designs which cannot be carried into execution; whoever wishes to keep true to his purpose must not listen to many counselors. The purpose is the thing proposed or set before the mind; the intention is the thing to which the mind bends or inclines; purpose and intend differ therefore both in the nature of the action and the object; we purpose seriously; we intend vaguely; we set about that which we purpose; we may delay that which we have only intended; the execution of one's purpose rests mostly with one's self; the fulfillment of an intention depends upon circumstances; a man of a resolute temper is not to be diverted from his purpose by trifling objects; we may be disappointed in our intentions by a variety of unforeseen but uncontrollable events. Mean, which is a term altogether of colloquial use, differs but little from intend, except that it is used for more familiar objects; to mean is simply to have in the mind; to intend is to lean with the mind toward anything. Purpose is always applied to some proximate or definite object; intend and mean to that which is general or remote; we purpose to set out at a certain time or go a certain route; we mean to set out as soon as we can, and go the way that shall be found most agreeable; the moralist designs by his writings to effect a reformation in the manners of men; a writer purposes to treat on a given subject in some particular manner; it is ridiculous to lay down rules which are not intended to be kept; an honest man always means to satisfy his creditors. Design and purpose are taken sometimes in the abstract sense; intend and mean always in connection with the agent who intends or means. . . . Design, when not expressly qualified by a contrary epithet, is used in a bad sense in connection with a particular agent; purpose, intention, and meaning, in an indifferent sense." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dě-sign (g silent), s. [Fr. dessin; Ital. disegno; Sp. designio.] [DESIGN, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: The idea formed in the mind of an artist on any particular subject, which he transfers to some medium, for the purpose of making it known to others; a sketch, a plan, a model, a representation in outline.

"Even the designs for the coin were made by French artists."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

2. Figuratively:

(1) A plan, a project, a scheme.
"He explains with perfect simplicity vast designs affecting all the governments of Europe."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vii.

(2) A plan, purpose, or course of action.

"Is he a prudent man, as to his temporal estate, that lays designs only for a day, without any prospect to the remaining part of his life?"—Millotson.

(3) A scheme, plan, or purpose designed with evil intention; a plot.

"Why did I doubt their quickness of career? And deem design had left me single here?"
Byron: Corsair, ii. 4.

(4) A set purpose, intention, or aim.

(5) Contrivance, skill, art, invention. [II. 1 (2).]

"The machine which we are inspecting demonstrates, by its construction, contrivance and design."—Paley: Nat. Theol., ch. ii.

(6) The realization or working out of an artistic idea.

"The painted walls, wherein were wrought Two grand designs."
Tennyson: Princess, vii. 106, 107.

II. Technically:

1. Art, &c.:
(1) The art of drawing or representing in lines the form of any object.

(2) The combination of invention and purpose which enables the artist to compose a picture or a group, without reference to the material in which it is executed.

(3) In the same sense as I (1).

"Whether thy hand strike out some free design, Where life awakes and dawns at every line."
Pope: Ep. iii. 3, 4.

2. Music: The plan and arrangement of each part.

¶ Argument from design:
Nat. Theol.: The argument in favor of the existence of God, as well as of His power, wisdom, and goodness, founded on the evidences of design in nature. Design is held to imply a Designer.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between design, plan, scheme, and project: "Arrangement is the idea common to these terms; the design includes the thing that is to be brought about; the plan includes the means by which it is to be brought about; a design was formed in the time of James I. for overturning the government of the country; the plan by which this was to have been realized consisted in placing gunpowder under the parliament-house and blowing up the assembly. A design is to be estimated according to its intrinsic worth; a plan is to be estimated according to its relative value, or fitness for the design: a design is noble or wicked, a plan fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, plī, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

is practicable: every founder of a charitable institution may be supposed to have a good design; but he may adopt an erroneous plan for obtaining the end proposed. Scheme and project respect both the end and the means, which makes them analogous to design and plan: the design stimulates to action; the plan determines the mode of action; the scheme and project consist most in speculation; the design and plan are equally practical, and suited to the ordinary and immediate circumstances of life. Scheme and project differ principally in the magnitude of the objects to which they are applied; the former being much less vast and extensive than the latter: a scheme may be formed by an individual for attaining any trifling advantage; projects are mostly conceived in matters of state, or public interest." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dē-sīgn'-a-ble (g silent), a. [Eng. design; -able.] Capable of being distinguished, or marked out; distinguishable.

"The power of all natural agents is limited; the mover must be confined to observe these proportions, and cannot pass over all these infinite designable degrees in an instant."—Digby.

dēs-ig-nāte, v. t. [DESIGNATE, a.]

1. To mark out, to indicate or show by visible marks or lines.

A. Transitive:

*1. To regret.

"He [Jehoram] reigned in Jerusalem eight years, and departed without being desired."—2 Chron. xxi. 20.

bōll, bōy; pōut, jōwł; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn;

-tion, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

2. To wish or long for the attainment or possession of some object from which pleasure, profit, or gratification is expected.

"They knew that, once landed in Great Britain, he would have neither the will nor the power to do those things which they most desired."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

3. To express a wish or desire to obtain; to beg for, to crave, to entreat.

"... he desires
Some private speech with you."
Shakesp.: All's Well, ii. 5.

¶ Shakespeare uses the word in two constructions.

(1) To desire a thing of a person.

"Sir, I desire of you
A conduct overland to Milford Haven."
Shakesp.: Cymbeline, iii. 5.

* (2) To desire a person of a thing.

"I humbly do desire your grace of pardon."
Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.

4. To bid, to enjoin.

* To require, to demand, to call for.

"A doleful case desires a doleful song."—Spenser.

* To invite.

"But shall we dance, if they desire us to 't'?"
Shakesp.: Love's Labor's Lost, v. 2.

B. Intrans.: To wish, to long, to be eager or anxious.

"Thy mother and thy brethren stand without, desiring to see thee."—Luke viii. 20.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between to desire, to wish, to long, to hanker, and to covet: "The desire is imperious, it demands gratification; the wish is less vehement, it consists of a strong inclination; longing is an impatient and continued species of desire; hankering is a desire for that which is set out of one's reach; coveting is a desire for that which belongs to another, or what is in his power to grant; we desire or long for that which is near at hand, or within view; we wish for and covet that which is more remote, or less distinctly seen; we hanker after that which has been once enjoyed; a discontented person wishes for more than he has; he who is in a strange land longs to see his native country; vicious men hanker after the pleasures which are denied them; ambitious men covet honors, avaricious men covet riches. Desires ought to be moderated; wishes to be limited; longings, hankerings and covetings to be suppressed; uncontrolled desires become the greatest torments; unbounded wishes are the bane of all happiness; ardent longings are mostly irrational, and not entitled to indulgence; coveting is expressly prohibited by the Divine law. Desire, as it regards others, is not less imperative than when it respects ourselves; it lays obligation on the person to whom it is expressed: a wish is gentle and unassuming; it appeals to the good nature of another; we act by the desire of a superior, and according to the wishes of an equal; the desire of a parent will amount to a command in the mind of a dutiful child; his wishes will be anticipated by the warmth of affection." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dē-gīr-ed, pa. par. or a. [DESIRE, v.]

dē-gīr-e-fūl*, dē-sīr-e-fūl*, dē-syr-fūl*, a. [Eng. desire; -ful(i).]

1. Full of desire, desirous, eager.

"Ye have need of readie and desirefull heartes."—Udall: Luke iv.

2. Desirable, pleasant.

"Ye eete not desireful breede."—Wycliffe: Daniel x. 3.

dē-gīr-e-fūl-nēss*, dē-sīr-e-fūl-nēss*, s. [Eng. desireful; -ness.] A state of being full of desire, or desirous.

"Jesus because he would ye more enkiendle desirefulness."—Udall: Luke xliii.

dē-gīr-e-lēss*, a. [Eng. desire; -less.] Without any desires, appetites, or wishes; languid.

"The appetite is dull and desireless."—Donne: Devotions, p. 25.

dē-gīr-ēr*, dē-syr-ēr*, s. [Eng. desir(e); -er.] One who desires or wishes eagerly for anything.

"I will counterfeit the bewitchment of some popular man, and give it bountiful to the desirers."—Shakesp.: Coriolanus, ii. 3.

dē-gīr-līg, dē-syr-yngē*, pr. par., a. & s. [DESIRE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of feeling desire; desire.

"My desiring was him to seen ouer al thing."
Rom. of the Rose.

dē-gīr-ōūs, dē-syr-ōūs*, a. [O. Fr. desiros; Fr. désireux; Ital. desideroso, from Low Lat. desiderosus, from desidero=to desire.]

1. Full of desire or eager longing; eager to obtain, wishful, anxious.

"Be not desirous of his dainties: for they are deceitful meat."—Prov. xxiii. 3.

*2. Desirable, pleasant.

"So desirous were the terrible torments unto Vincent, as a most pleasant banquet."—Bale: Select Works, p. 585.

†dē-gīr-ōūs-lī, dē-syr-ōūs-līe*, adv. [Eng. desirous; -ly.] With desire or eager longing; eagerly, anxiously.

"Affection of this instrument is a thinge, by whiche ye bee drawe desirously any thinge to wilne in coueitous maner."—Chaucer: Test. of Love, bk. iii.

dē-gīr-ōūs-nēss*, s. [English desirous; -ness.] The quality or state of being desirous; eager longing or desire.

dē-gīst, v. i. [Fr. désister; Sp. & Port. desistir; Ital. desistere, from Lat. desisto=to leave off; de=away, from, and sisto=to put or place.] To stop, cease, forbear, leave off, or discontinue (generally followed by from before the thing or practice given up, but sometimes by an infinitive).

"Desist, obedient to his high command."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, viii. 510.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to desist and to leave off: "Desist is applied to actions good, indifferent, or offensive to some person; leave off to actions that are indifferent; the former is voluntary or involuntary, the latter voluntary; we are frequently obliged to desist, but we leave off at our option. . . . He who annoys another must be made to desist; he who does not wish to offend will leave off when requested." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

¶ Blair discriminates the words desist, renounce, quit, and leave off as follows: "Each of these words implies some pursuit or object relinquished; but from different motives. We desist from the difficulty of accomplishing. We renounce on account of the disagreeableness of the object, or pursuit. We quit for the sake of some other thing which interests us more; and we leave off because we are weary of the design. A politician desists from his designs, when he finds they are impracticable; he renounces the court because he has been affronted by it; he quits ambition for study or retirement; and leaves off his attendance on the great, as he becomes old and weary of it." (Blair: Lect. on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres, 1817, vol. i., pp. 228, 229.)

†dē-gīst-ancē, dē-gīst-encē*, s. [Low Lat. desistantia, desistentia, from Lat. desistens, pr. par. of desisto.] The act of desisting, ceasing, or leaving off; cessation.

"Men make it both the motive and excuse of their desistance from giving any more, that they have given already."—Boyle: Works, i. 269.

dē-gīst-līg, pr. par., a. & s. [DESIST.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of leaving off or ceasing; cessation, desistance.

"The going into the city was a pursuance and carrying on of the enterprise, and not a desisting or departing from it."—State Trials; Sir C. Blount (an. 1600).

dē-gīst-ive*, a. [Eng. desist; -ive.] Ending, concluding.

dē-gī-tion*, s. [Lat. desitus, pa. par. of desino=to cease, to desist.] An end or conclusion.

"The soul must be immortal, and unsubject to death or desition."—The Soul's Immortality Defended (1645), p. 27.

dē-gī-tive, a. [Lat. desitus, pa. par. of desino=to desist, to leave off.] Ending, concluding, final.

"Inceptive and desitive propositions are of this sort; the fogs vanish as the sun rises."—Watts.

dēsk, deske*, s. [A. S. desc=a dish (q. v.); Dut. disch; Ger. tisch; Sw. & Dan. disk=a table; O. H. Ger. disc, tisc=a dish, a platter.] [DISK, DISK.]

1. Lit.: A sloping table, frame, or case for a writer or reader, frequently made with drawers below, and racks for books, &c., above; the lid is also often made to lift up, so as to form a lock-up receptacle for papers, &c. The term is also applied to a small frame or writing-case to stand on a table.

"Deske. Pluteum."—Prompt. Parv.

2. Fig.: Mercantile affairs or occupation; the position of a clerk.

"Those who from the miserable servitude of the desk have been raised to empire."—Burke: On a Regicide Peace, Lett. 3.

desk-knife, s. An eraser.

desk-work, s. Work at a desk, writing, copying; the work of a clerk. (Tennyson.)

dēsk*, v. t. [DESK, s.]

1. To place or set at a desk.

"Then are you entertain'd and desk't up by

Our Ladies Pealter and the rosary."

John Hall: Poems (1646), p. 2.

2. To shut up as in a desk.

"With this I'll read a leaf of that small Iliad, That in a walnut-shell was desked."

Albunazar, l. 3.

dēsked*, pa. par. or a. [DESK, v.]

dēs-mān, s. [Fr. & Sw.]

Zool.: The Musk-rat (q. v.).

dēs-manth'-ūs, s. [Gr. desmē=a bundle, and anthos=a blossom, a flower. So named from the fascicles of flowers, which seem as if bound in bundles.]

Bot.: A genus of leguminous plants. The Chinese pot-herb formerly called Desmanthus natans is now termed Neptunia oleracea. The seeds of D. virgatus are strung like beads.

dēs-mīd, dēs-mīd'-ī-ān, s. [DESMIDIUM.]

Bot.: A plant belonging to the family Desmidiaceae.

dēs-mīd-i-ā-ōē-ā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. desmidi(um), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceae.]

Bot.: A family of Confervoid Algae, consisting entirely of microscopic flexible organisms inhabiting fresh-water, scarcely a specimen of which can be found that does not contain some of them. Sometimes they adhere in large quantities to aquatic plants, forming green films investing these; at others they rest as a thick coating at the bottom of water, or lie intermingled with Confervæ, &c. The most distinctive feature in their appearance is the bilateral symmetry, indicative of the tendency to divide into two valves or segments. Many of the genera have the power of fixing themselves to external objects, and possess a feeble power of locomotion. Reproduction is effected by (1) cell-division, where each pustule divides into two; (2) by zoospores; (3) by conjugation. There are five tribes, containing twenty-two genera. (Griffith & Henfrey.) dēs-mīd-i-ē-ā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. desmidi(um), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ae.]

Bot.: A tribe of Desmidiaceae, in which the cells are united into an elongated jointed filament. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

dēs-mīd-i-ūm, s. [Gr. desmē=a bundle, and eidos=form, appearance.]

Bot.: A genus of Desmidiaceae, tribe Desmidiæ, having the cells united into a brittle, regularly-twisted triangular or quadrangular filament, and two-toothed at the angles. It contains two species. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

dēs'-mīne, s. [Gr. desmē=a bundle.]

Mineralogy:

1. The same as HYPOSTILBITE (q. v.).

2. The same as STILBITE (q. v.).

dēs-mī-ō-spēr'-mē-ā, s. pl. [Gr. desmios=binding, desmos=a chain, a bond, and sperma=a seed.]

Bot.: A genus of rose-spored Algae, in which the spores form distinct chains like necklaces.

dēs-mō'-brŷ-ā, s. pl. [Gr. desmos=a chain, a bond, and bryon=a kind of mossy sea-weed.]

Bot.: A name applied to ferns in which the fronds are produced terminally.

dēs-mō'-dī-ūm, s. [Gr. desmos, desmē=a bundle, and eidos=form, appearance.]

Bot.: A genus of papilionaceous plants, sub-tribe Hedysaræ. The leaves have generally three leaflets; more rarely they are simple. The flowers are in racemes or panicles; the legumes jointed, each joint one-seeded. About 100 species are known, chiefly from South America or from India. Desmodium gyrans, an Indian species, is the Moving-plant, so called from the rotatory movement of the leaflets. It is sometimes cultivated in greenhouses. D. diffusum is a fodder-plant.

dēs-mō'-dī-ūs, s. [DESMODIUM.]

Zool.: A genus of Bats, including the true Vampires (q. v.).

dēs-mōg'-rā-phŷ, s. [Gr. desmos=a bond, a fetter, from dēō=to bind, and graphō=to write.]

Anat.: A description of the ligaments of the body.

dēs-mōid, a. [Gr. desmos=a bond, a fetter, and eidos=form, appearance.]

Surg.: Resembling a bundle. (Applied to certain tumors which on section show numerous white fibers closely interwoven and interlaced in bundles.)

dēs-mōl'-ō-gŷ, s. [Gr. desmos=a bond, a fetter, and logos=a discourse.]

Anat.: That branch of the science which treats of the ligaments and sinews of the body.

dēs-mōnē'-ūs, s. [Gr. desmos=a bond, and onychos=a hook.]

Bot.: A genus of Brazilian palms, tribe Coccosæ. They have reed-like flexuous stems, and straight or hooked prickles. The flowers are cream-colored.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, plit, sire, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

the drupes red. Desmoncus macranthos, the Jacitara of South America, is a climbing or trailing palm. Strips of the stem are plated by the Indians so as to make strainers for squeezing out the poisonous juice of the mandioc root. (Loudon, Treasures of Bot., &c.)

dēs-mōt-ō-mŷ, s. [Gr. desmos=a bond, a fetter, and tomē=a cutting; temnō=to cut.] Anat.: The act of dissecting the ligaments and sinews of the body.

dēs-ō-lāte, *des-o-lat, *dis-so-late, a. & s. [Lat. desolatus, pa. par. of desolo=to make lonely or desolate; de (intens.), and solo=to make lonely; solus=alone.]

A. As adjective:

1. Deprived of or without inhabitants; uninhabited, deserted.

"What a forest of masts would have bristled in the desolate port of Newry."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

2. Laid waste, ruined.

"Every remnant departed against itself shall be desolate."—Wycliffe: Luke xi.

*3. Destitute, unprovided.

"I were right now of tales desolate."—Chaucer: C. T., 4,551.

4. Solitary, forsaken, forlorn.

"Here to be lonely is not desolate,
For much I view which I could most desire."—Byron: Epistle to Augusta.

5. Afflicted, comfortless.

"The heart once left thus desolate Must fly at last for ease—to hate."—Byron: The Giaour.

*B. As subst.: One who is forsaken, afflicted, or comfortless.

"A poor desolate
That now had measured many a weary mile."—G. Fletcher: Christ's Victory, ii. 1.

¶ For the difference between desolate and solitary, see SOLITARY.

dēs-ō-lāte, v. t. [In Fr. désoler; Ital. desolare; Sp. desollar, from Lat. desolo.] [DESOLATE, a.]

1. To deprive of inhabitants; to lay waste; to reduce to solitude or dreariness; to make into a wilderness or desert.

"Pray to that God who, high on Ida's brow, Surveys thy desolated realms below."—Pope: Homage to Iliad, xiv. 359, 360.

2. To ruin; to reduce to a state of ruin.

"Who curse the hour your Arabs came To desolate our shrines of flame."—Moore: The Fire Worshipers.

dēs-ō-lāt-ed, pa. par. or a. [DESOLATE, v.]

dēs-ō-lāt-ŷ, adv. [Eng. desolate; -ly.] In a desolate, forsaken, or deserted manner.

"I have been kept a great while from you desolately alone."—Fox: Book of Martyrs, p. 1,900.

dēs-ō-lāt-ness, s. [Eng. desolate; -ness.] The quality or state of being desolate.

dēs-ō-lāt-ēr, *dēs-ō-lāt-ōr, s. [Eng. desolator; -er.] One who desolates, lays waste, or destroys.

"But who is this desolator, or maker of desolations?"—Mead: On Daniel, p. 44.

dēs-ō-lāt-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DESOLATE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of making desolate, deserted, or ruined.

dēs-ō-lā-tion, *dēs-ō-lā-çion, s. [Fr. désolation; Sp. desolacion; Ital. desolazione, from Lat. desolatus, pa. par. of desolo=to make lonely or desolate.]

1. The act of desolating or making desolate, waste, and deserted; a laying waste, a depriving of inhabitants; devastation, depopulation.

"Come, behold the works of the Lord, what desolations he hath made in the earth."—Ps. xlii. 8.

2. A desolate state or condition; ruin.

"The said island was brought almost into desolation."—Baikuyt: Voyages, i. 14.

3. A place made desolate; a wilderness, a wild.

"How is Babylon become a desolation among the nations."—Jer. i. 23.

4. A state or condition of being forsaken, deserted, afflicted, or comfortless; sadness.

"And mine's the guilt, and mine the hell,
This bosom's desolation dooming."—Byron: Herod's Lament.

¶ For the difference between desolation and ravage, see RAVAGE.

dēs-ō-lāt-ōr, s. [Eng. desolat(e); -or.] The same as DESOLATOR (q. v.).

"The Desolator desolate!
The Victor overthrown!"—Byron: Ode to Napoleon.

dēs-ō-lāt-ōr-ŷ, a. [Eng. desolator; -y.] Causative or accompanied by desolation.

"These desolatory judgments are a notable improvement of God's mercy."—Bishop Hall: Rem., p. 55.

dēs-ō-phīs-ti-cāte, v. t. [Prof. de=away, from, and Eng. sophisticate (q. v.).] To clear from sophism or error.

dēs-ōx-a-lāte, s. [Eng. desoxal(ic), and suff. -ate (Chem.) (q. v.).]

Chem.: A salt of desoxalic acid (q. v.).

dēs-ōx-āl-ic, a. [Fr. pref. dés, and Eng. oxalic (q. v.).]

desoxalic acid, s.

Chem.: $C_5H_6O_8$, or $HO\cdot C\begin{matrix} CO\cdot OH \\ CO\cdot OH \end{matrix}$. A tribasic acid, obtained by acting on ethylic oxalate (containing alcohol) with sodium amalgam, which forms its triethyl ether, crystallizing in large prisms, melting at 85°. By acting on this compound with baryta water, and decomposing the barium salt with sulphuric acid, the free acid is obtained on evaporation in deliquescent crystals; by heating its solution to 45° it decomposes into CO_2 and racemic acid $HO\cdot OC\cdot CH(OH)\cdot CH(OH)\cdot CO\cdot OH$.

dēs-ōx-ŷ, in compos. [Fr. pref. dés, and Eng. oxy(gen) (q. v.).]

desoxy-anisoin, s.

Chem.: $C_{16}H_{18}O_3$. A crystalline substance soluble in alcohol and ether, melting at 95°, obtained by the action of dilute sulphuric acid on hydranisoin, $C_{16}H_{18}O_4$.

desoxy-benzoin, s.

Chem.: Phenyl-benzyl-ketone, $C_6H_5\cdot CO\cdot CH_2\cdot C_6H_5$. Obtained by the action of zinc and hydrochloric acid on chloro-benzil $C_6H_5\cdot CO\cdot CCl_2\cdot C_6H_5$, or by heating monobrom-stilbene with water to 180°. It crystallizes out of alcohol in large tables which melt at 55°. Desoxy-benzoin can also be obtained by reducing benzoin $C_6H_5\cdot CO\cdot CH(OH)\cdot C_6H_5$.

desoxy-glutaric acid, s. [GLUTARIC ACID.]

dē-spāir, *despeir, *despeire, *despeyr, *dispayre, *dispayre, s. [Fr. désespérer. At a not remote period this word and diffidence were all but synonymous with each other, though they differ in etymology; despair meaning the absence of hope, and diffidence that of faith.] [DESPAIR, v.]

1. The absence, or loss of hope; hopelessness.

"Thinking to fly from despair, that swifter than keel is or canvas."

Longfellow: Courtship of Miles Standish, v.

*2. That which causes despair, or desperation.

"The mere despair of surgery he cures."

Shakespeare: Macbeth, iv. 3.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between despair, desperation, and despondency: "Despair is a state of mind produced by the view of external circumstances; desperation and despondency may be the fruit of the imagination; the former therefore always rests on some ground, the latter are sometimes ideal: despair lies mostly in reflection; desperation and despondency in the feelings; the former marks a state of vehement and impatient feeling, the latter that of fallen and mournful feeling. Despair is often the forerunner of desperation and despondency, but it is not necessarily accompanied with effects so powerful: the strongest mind may have occasion to despair when circumstances warrant the sentiment; men of an impetuous character are apt to run into a state of desperation; a weak mind full of morbid sensibility is most liable to fall into despondency. Despair interrupts or checks exertion; desperation impels to greater exertions; despondency unfits for exertion: when a physician despairs of making a cure, he lays aside the application of remedies; when a soldier sees nothing but death or disgrace before him, he is driven to desperation, and redoubles his efforts." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dē-spāir, *de-speire, *de-speyre, *de-spayre, *di-speire, *di-speyre, v. i. & t. [O. Fr. desperer; Fr. désespérer; O. Sp. desperar; Sp. desesperar; Ital. desperare, from Lat. despero: de=away, from, and spero=to hope; sper=hope.]

A. Intrans.: To be without hope; to be or fall into a state of despair; to give up all hope (followed by of before that of which one gives up hope).

"In the mournful tone of a man who despaired of ever being reconciled to them."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvii.

¶ Sometimes followed by to.

"He has incur'd a long arrear,
And must despair to pay."—Cowper: Bill of Mortality (1792).

*3. Reflex.: To give up to despair.

"Thou shalt the nought despeire."—Gower, i. 272.

*C. Transitive:

1. To give up or lose all hope of or in; to despair of.

"Full counsel must mature; peace is despair'd;
For who can think submission?"—Milton: P. L., i. 660, 661.

2. To cause to despair; to create despair in.

"Miseries for a moment could not despair them."—Chr. Sutton: Learn to Die (1600), p. 189 (ed. 1848).

dē-spāir-a-ble, *de-speir-a-ble, a. [Latin desperabilis.] Desperate, fit or liable to be despaired of.

"Whi . . . my wounde desperable forsook to be cured."—Wycliffe: Jerem. xv. 18.

dē-spāir-ed, *de-speyred, *di-speired, pa. par. or a. [DESPAIR, v.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Despaired of; hopeless.

"Thus despeyred out of all cure."—Chaucer: Troilus, v. 718.

2. In despair; desperate; without hope.

"I, as who saith, all despeired."—Gower, i. 281.

dē-spāir-ēr, s. [Eng. despair; -er.] One who falls into, or gives way to despair.

"He cheers the fearful, and commends the bold,
And makes despairers hope for good success."—Dryden: Annus Mirabilis, colxii.

dē-spāir-fūl, a. [Eng. despair; -ful(l).] Full of despair; desperate, hopeless.

"Laying open in all her gestures the despairful affliction."—Swayne: Arcadia, bk. v.

dē-spāir-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DESPAIR, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act or state of giving up all hope; despair, desperation.

dē-spāir-ing-ly, adv. [Eng. despairing; -ly.] In a despairing, hopeless manner; in a manner expressive of or indicating despair.

"He speaks severely and despairingly of our society."—Boyle: Works, i. 237.

dē-spāir-ing-ness, s. [Eng. despairing; -ness.] The quality or state of being despairing, or in despair; hopelessness.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The fate, lot, doom, or fortune appointed, allotted, or predetermined for each person or thing; the ultimate fate of a person.

"At the pit of Acheron

Meet me in the morning; thither he Will come to know his destiny."

Shakesp.: Macbeth, iii. 5.

2. Unavoidable, invincible necessity; fate.

"All unavoids is the doom of destiny."

Shakesp.: Richard III., iv. 4.

II. Myth.: The power which presides over the lot or fortune of men; the same as the Paros or Fates in classical mythology. (Generally in the plural.)

"Perhaps great Hector then had found his fate;
But Jove and Destiny prolonged his date."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, xi. 213, 214.

¶ (1) Crabbs thus discriminates between destiny, fate, lot, and doom: "All these terms are employed with regard to human events which are not under one's control. Destiny is used in regard to one's station and walk in life; fate in regard to what one suffers; lot in regard to what one gets or possesses; and doom is that portion of one's destiny or fate which depends upon the will of another: destiny is marked out; fate is fixed; the lot is assigned; the doom is passed. It was the destiny of Julius Cæsar to act a great part in the world, and to establish a new form of government at Rome; it was his fate at last to die by the hands of assassins, the chief of whom had been his avowed friends; had he been contented with a humble lot than that of an empire, he might have enjoyed honors, riches, and a long life; his doom was sealed by the last step which he took in making himself emperor: it is not permitted for us to inquire into our future destiny; it is our duty to submit to our fate, to be contented with our lot, and prepared for our doom: a parent may have great influence over the destiny of his child, by the education he gives to him, or the principles he instills into his mind; there are many who owe their unhappy fate entirely to the want of early habits of piety; riches or poverty may be assigned to us as our lot."

(2) He thus discriminates between destiny and destination: "The destiny is the point or line marked out in the walk of life; the destination is the place fixed upon in particular; as every man has his peculiar destiny, so every traveler has his particular destination. Destiny is altogether set above human control; no man can determine, though he may influence, the destiny of another: destination is, however, the specific act of an individual, either for himself or another: we leave the destiny of a man to develop itself; but we may inquire about his own destination, or that of his children: it is a consoling reflection that the destinies of short-sighted mortals like ourselves are in the hands of One who both can and will overrule them to our advantage if we place full reliance on Him." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dēs-tīt-u-ēnt, a. [Lat. destituens, pr. par. of destituo.] Failing, wanting, deficient.

2. The state of the dead, the "grave" in a figurative sense.

"Shall thy loving-kindness be declared in the grave? or thy faithfulness in destruction?"—Ps. lxxxviii. 11.

3. One of the seven names for Gehenna, or Hell, in the Jewish Talmud.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between destruction and ruin: "Destruction is an act of immediate violence; ruin is a gradual process: a thing is destroyed by some external action upon it; a thing falls to ruin of itself: we witness destruction whenever war or the adverse elements rage; we witness ruin whenever the works of man are exposed to the effects of time: nevertheless, if destruction be the more forcible and rapid, ruin is, on the other hand, more sure and complete; what is destroyed may be rebuilt or replaced, but what is ruined is lost forever, it is past recovery. When houses or towns are destroyed, fresh ones rise up in their places; but when commerce is ruined, it seldom returns to its old course. Destruction admits of various degrees; ruin is something positive and general. The property of a man may be destroyed to a greater or less extent, without necessarily involving his ruin. The ruin of a family is oftentimes the consequence of destruction by fire. The health is destroyed by violent exercises, or some other active cause; it is ruined by a course of imprudent conduct. The happiness of a family is destroyed by broils and discord; the morals of a young man are ruined by a continued intercourse with vicious companions. Destruction may be used either in the proper or the improper sense; ruin has mostly a moral application. The destruction of both body and soul is the consequence of sin; the ruin of a man, whether in his temporal or spiritual concerns, is inevitable, if he follow the dictates of misguided passion." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dě-strūct-tion-a-ble, a. [English destruction; -able.] Destroying, destructive.

dě-strūct-tion-fūl, a. [English destruction; -ful(l).] Destructive, wasteful.

dě-strūct-tion-ist, s. [Eng. destruction; -ist.]

1. Ord. Lang.: One who is given to destruction; a destructive.

2. Theol.: One who believes in the total destruction or annihilation of the wicked.

dě-strūct-tīve, a. & s. [Fr. destructif; Prov. destructive; Sp. destructivo; Ital. distruttivo, from Latin destructivus, from destructus, pa. par. of destruo=to destroy.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Causing, or tending to destruction; having the quality or property of destroying; having a tendency to destroy; ruinous.

"Nor should I much condemn it, if it spring

From disregard of time's destructive power."

Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. vi.

2. Pernicious, ruinous, baleful.

¶ It is followed by of or to before the thing destroyed.

"He will put an end to so absurd a practice, which makes our most refined diversions destructive of all politeness."—Addison.

"Excess of cold, as well as heat, pains us; because it is equally destructive of that temper which is necessary to the preservation of life."—Locke.

3. Mischievous, wasteful.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: [DESTRUCTIVE DISTILLATION.]

2. Logic: [INDIRECT.]

"In a destructive series you of course go back from the denial of the last consequent to the denial of the first antecedent: 'G is not H, therefore A is not B.'"—Whately: Elements of Logic, bk. ii., ch. iv., § 7.

B. As subst.: One who is given or inclined to destruction; one who favors the destruction or subversion of existing institutions; a radical, a destructionist.

"Anarchist, Destructive, and the like."—Finlay: Hist. Greece.

destructive distillation, s.

Chem.: Dry distillation. The heating of organic bodies which are non-volatile in a retort. They undergo decomposition, liberating gases consisting of CH_4 , C_2H_4 , H_2 , C_2H_2 , C_2H_6 , CO , CO_2 , CS_2 , NH_3 , H_2S , &c. A liquid generally distills over, and a solid mass, consisting chiefly of charcoal, if sufficient heat has been applied, remains in the retort. The chief substances which are commercially distilled are: (1) Coal, which yields gases [COAL-GAS], an aqueous liquid containing chiefly ammonia, C_6H_6 , CO , a dark oily substance, or tar [COAL-TAR], and [CORE] remain in the retort. (2) Wood, which yields gases, an aqueous solution which contains methyl alcohol, CH_3OH [WOOD-SPIRIT], and acetic acid [PYROLIGNEOUS ACID], and small quantities of acetone, methyl acetate, &c., and also a tar [WOOD-TAR] and [CHARCOAL] is left. (3) Bones, which yield gases, and a liquid called Bone-oil (q. v.), and leave a residue of Bone-ash (q. v.). [ANIMAL CHARCOAL.] Many new organic compounds are formed by the dry distillation of organic bodies: thus citric acid yields acetic, itaconic, and citraconic acids. By the dry distillation of calcium salts of organic acids ketones are obtained, thus calcium acetate yields acetone, CH_3COCH_3 ; and by the dry distillation of a potassium salt of a fatty acid with potassium formate, the aldehyde is obtained.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between destructive, ruinous, and pernicious: "Destructive and ruinous, as the epithets of destruction and ruin, have a similar distinction in their sense and application; fire and sword are destructive things; a poison is destructive: consequences are ruinous; a condition or state is ruinous; intestine commotions are ruinous to the prosperity of a state. Pernicious approaches nearer to destructive than to ruinous; both the former imply tendency to dissolution, which may be more or less gradual; but the latter refers us to the result itself, to the dissolution as already having taken place: hence we speak of the instrument or cause as being destructive or pernicious, and the action or event as ruinous: destructive is applied in the most extended sense to every object which has been created or supposed to be so; pernicious is applicable only to such objects as act only in a limited way: sin is equally destructive to both body and soul; certain food is pernicious to the body; certain books are pernicious to the mind." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dě-strūct-tīve-lŷ, adv. [Eng. destructive; -ly.] In a destructive manner; with the power of destruction; ruinously.

"What remains but to breathe out Moses' wish? O that men were not so destructively foolish!"—More: Decay of Piety.

dě-strūct-tīve-nēss, s. [Eng. destructive; -ness.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The quality or state of being destructive, ruinous, fatal, or pernicious.

"The desperate and excessive unavoidable destructiveness of these monstrous ways to the speedy peace and settlement of our church and state."—Frymne: Speech, Parl. Hist. (1648.)

2. Phren.: An organ above the ear, the function of which is said to be a propensity to destroy.

dě-strūct-tōr, s. [Lat.; Fr. destructeur.] A destroyer, a ruiner, a consumer.

"Helmot wittil calls the fire the destructor and the artificial death of things."—Boyle: Works, i. 527.

dēs-tūrne, v. t. [O. Fr. destourner; Fr. dé-tourner.] To turn aside, to divert.

"Thi fader pray al thylike harme desturne."

Chaucer: Troilus, iii. 669.

dě-sul'-phu-riz-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DESULPHURIZE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The same as DESULPHURATION.

desulphurizing furnace, s.

Metall.: A roasting-furnace for driving off the sulphur from pyritic ores. There are many forms adapted to the requirements of different ores, facilities of building, kind of fuel, and the more or less perfect result demanded by the value of the metal and other commercial and economical incidents. Ores are desulphurized by roasting in heaps: In reverberatory furnaces of the usual kind [COPPER-FURNACE]; in rotary inclined cylinders exposed to the heat of a fire beneath; in a flue or stack, where they fall through a column of flame [DECARBONIZING-FURNACE]; on a rotary-table furnace, where the desulphurizing-chamber is surrounded with flues, through which the caloric currents from the furnace are compelled to pass on their way to the chimney. (Knight.)

děs-ūl-tōr-i-lý, adv. [Eng. desultory; -ly.] In a desultory, loose, or disconnected manner.

děs-ūl-tōr-i-něss, s. [Eng. desultory; -ness.] The quality or state of being desultory or disconnected; discursiveness.

"Much of the seeming desultoryness of my method."—Boyle: Works, ii. 254.

děs-ūl-tōr-i-ōus, a. [Lat. desultorius.] [DESULTORY.] Desultory, disconnected, discursive, unmethodical.

"It is not only desultorious and light, but insignificant."—Bp. Taylor: Rule of Conscience, bk. i., ch. ii.

děs-ūl-tōr-ý, v. [Lat. desultorius=inconstant, fickle, from desultor=one who in the circus vaulted from one horse to another: de=down, from, and salio=to leap.]

I. Lit.: Leaping, skipping, or moving about. "I shot at it, but it was so desultory I missed my aim."—Gilbert White.

II. Figuratively:

1. Passing from one subject to another; following no regular plan; loose, disconnected, unsystematic.

"This makes my reading wild and desultory."—Warburton: Lett., Feb. 2, 1740.

*2. Unstable, fickle, inconstant.

"Unstable, i. e., light, desultory, unbalanced minds."—Atterbury: Sermons, vol. iii., ser. 9.

3. Said or done at random; not following any method, rule, or connection; random.

"Need I to thee, dear Erskine, tell,
I love the licence all too well,
In sounds now lowly and now strong,
To raise the desultory song?"

Scott: Marmion, iii. (Introd.)

¶ For the difference between desultory and cur-sory, see CURSORY.

dě-sul'-tūre, s. [Lat. desultura, from desilio=to leap down.] A leaping; a leap from one horse to another. (Ash.)

dě-sū-me, v. t. [Lat. desumo: de=away, from, and sumo=to take.]

1. To take away, to take from, to derive.

"They have left us relations suitable to those of Ælian and Pliny, whence they desumed their narrations."—Brown.

2. To deduce, to draw.

"That part of our eighteenth experiment, whence the matter of fact is desumed."—Boyle: Works, i. 132.

dě-sūmp-tion, s. [Lat. desumptus, pa. par. of desumo.] The act of taking from others. (Ash.)

desvaux-i-ā-çō-sə (desvaux as dā-vōz), s. pl. [Named after M. Desvaux, a French botanist, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -acē.]

Bot.: Bristleworts, an order of small herbs, like species of Scirpus, having setaceous leaves, flowers glumaceous in a spathe, fruit consisting of utricles opening longitudinally, and separate ovaries attached to a common axis. They are natives of the South Sea Islands and New Holland.

dě-sý-nōn-ý-mí-zā-tion, s. [Eng. desynonymize (e); -ation.] The act or process of desynonymizing.

dě-sý-nōn-ý-mize, v. t. [Pref. de=away, from, and Eng. synonymize (q. v.).] To turn or apply to different meanings words originally synonymous.

"This [flicker] and flutter are thoroughly desynonymized now."—Trench: Select Glossary, p. 79.

dě-sý-nōn-ý-mí-zing, pr. par., a. & s. [DESYNONYMIZE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: Discriminating the meaning of two words formerly identical in signification.

dě-tāch, v. t. & i. [Fr. détacher=to unfasten: dě=Lat. dis=apart, from, and Fr. tacher*=to fasten, found in attacher, détacher.]

A. Transitive:

1. To separate, to disengage, to disunite, to set: loose, or part.

"The several parts of it are detached one from the other, and yet join again, one cannot tell how."—Pope.

2. To separate and send away from a main body on some special duty or service.

"If ten men are in war with forty, and the latter detach only an equal number to the engagement, what benefit do they receive from their superiority?"—Addison.

3. To disengage, to distract.

"To detach us from the present scene, to fix our affections on things above."—Porteus: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 1.

B. Intrans.: To become detached, disunited, or separated.

"Detaching fold by fold

From those still heights."

Tennyson: Vision of Sin, iii.

¶ For the difference between detach and to separate, see SEPARATE.

dě-tāch'ed, pa. par. or a. [DETACH.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Separated, disengaged, loose, not connected together.

"A detached body of the French."—Burnet: Hist. of his own time (an. 1709).

2. Paint.: A term applied to figures which appear to stand out one from the other, or from the background. (Weale.)

detached escapement, s.

Hor.: The detached escapement was invented by Mudge in the seventeenth century. The term detached is also applied to the ordinary form of lever-escapement with two pallets, which engage the teeth of the scape-wheel, and a fork which engages a pin on the balance-arbor. The term detached, in this case, is to distinguish it from the anchor-escapement, wherein a segment-rack engages a pinion on the balance-arbor. [LEVER-ESCAPEMENT.]

detached work, s.

Fort.: A work included in the defense, but placed outside the body of the place.

dě-tāch-ēd-lý, adv. [Eng. detached; -ly.] Disconnectedly, desultorily; without proper arrangement or connection.

"Brief notices of different particulars of this case are given detachedly by Rushworth."—State Trials: Judge Jenkins (an. 1647).

dě-tāch-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DETACH.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of setting free, separating, or disengaging.

dě-tāch'mēnt, s. [Fr. détachement.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of detaching or disengaging.

2. The state of being detached.

3. A number of things or persons detached or separated.

"Who for the task should fit detachments choose From all the atoms?" Blackmore.

4. Specif.: In the same sense as II.

"As soon as he learned that a detachment of the Gaelic army was advancing toward Perth . . ."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

II. Technically:

1. Mil. & Nav.: A body of troops or a number of ships detached from the main body, and sent away on some special service or expedition.

"Against a detachment of fifty men."—Sterne: Tristram Shandy, vol. iv., ch. 7.

2. Gun.: The men detailed to serve a gun.

*3. Fine Arts: The parts of a work as distinguished from the whole.

dě-tāil, v. t. [Fr. détailler = (1) to cut into pieces, (2) to relate minutely; Ital. distagliare.] [DETAIL, s.]

1. Ord. Lang.: To set forth, to relate or describe minutely, particularly, or in detail; to particularize.

"They will perceive the mistakes of these philosophers, and be able to answer their arguments, without my being obliged to detail them."—Cheyne.

2. Mil.: To detach or appoint for any particular service or expedition.

¶ To detail on the plane:

Arch.: Said of a molding which is exhibited in profile by abutting against the plane.

dě-tāil, dě-tāil, s. [Fr. détail, from détailler = (1) to cut into pieces, (2) to relate minutely; Fr. dé = Lat. de (intens.), and tailer = to cut; taille = a cut; Lat. talea = a rod, a layer; Low Lat. taleo, talio = to cut; Sp. tallar; Port. talhar; Ital. tagliare = to cut.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A minute part; a particular, an item.

"He was laborious, clearheaded, and profoundly versed in the details of finance."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

2. A minute, particular, or circumstantial account.

"I shall not enter into a detail of the arguments."—Derham: Astro-Theol., bk. iv., ch. iii.

II. Technically:

1. Mil.: A body or number of men detailed for some special duty or expedition.

2. Fine Arts: Minute or particular parts of a picture, statue, &c., as distinguished from the work as a whole.

3. Arch.: A term usually applied to the drawings on a large scale for the use of builders, and generally called working drawings.

¶ In detail: Minutely, particularly, circumstantially.

"I was unable to treat this part of my subject more in detail."—Pope.

dě-tāil'ed, pa. par. & a. [DETAIL, v.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Related or described in detail; as, a detailed account.

"A professed and detailed poem on the subject."—Warburton: Divine Legation, bk. iv., p. 83.

2. Exact, particular, minute; as, a detailed examination.

dě-tāil-ēr, s. [Eng. detail; -er.] One who details or relates anything in detail.

"Individuality was sunk in the number of detailers."—Seward: Lett., vi., 135.

dě-tāil-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DETAIL, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of relating or setting forth in detail.

dě-tāin, de-tayne, de-teigne, v. t. [Fr. détenir; Lat. detineo=to keep or hold back: de=away, from, and teneo=to hold; Sp. & Port. detener; Ital. detenere.]

1. To keep or hold back that which belongs to another; to withhold.

"No longer then (his fury if thou dread) Detain the relics of great Hector dead."
Pope: Homer's Iliad, xxiv. 171, 172.

"The interest of the sum fraudulently detained in the Exchequer by the Cabal."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

2. To withhold, to keep back.

"These things sting
His mind so venomously, that burning shame Detains him from Cordelia."
Shakesp.: Lear, iv. 3.

3. To restrain or delay from proceeding; to stop.

"But adverse winds detained him three weeks at the Hague."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxv.

4. To keep in custody or confinement.

"A constable . . . is authorized to detain the party suspected."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iv., ch. xxi.

¶ For the difference between to detain and to hold, see HOLD.

dē-tāin, de-taine, s. [DETAIN, v.] Detention.

"And gan enquire of him with mylder mood
The certaine cause of Artegals detain."
Spenser: F. Q., v. vi. 15.

dē-tāin-al, s. [Eng. detain; -al.] The act of detaining; detention. (W. Taylor: Annual Review (1806), vol. iv., p. 116.)

dē-tāin-dēr, s. [DETAIN, v.]

Law: A writ for holding one in custody. Probably the word is a corruption for detainer (q. v.).

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

dě-tain'ed, pa. par. or a. [DETAIN, v.]

dě-tain-ēr, s. [Eng. detain; -ēr.]

I. Ord. Lang.: One who detains or keeps back any person or thing.

"The detainers of tithes, and cheaters of men's inheritances."—Bp. Taylor.

II. Law:

1. The keeping or holding possession of that which belongs to another.

"Deprivation of possession may also be by an unjust detainer of another's goods, though the original taking was lawful. As if I lend a man a horse, and he afterward refuse to restore it, this injury consists in the detaining, and not in the original taking; and the regular method for me to recover possession is by action of detinue."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iii., ch. vi.

2. A writ by which a person arrested at the suit of one debtor may be detained at the suit of another a writ of detainer.

*3. The act of detaining any person in custody.

"Unless some cause of the commitment, detainer, or restraint be expressed."—State Trials: Liberty of the Subject (1628).

¶ (1) Forcible detainer:

Law: A violently taking or keeping possession of lands and tenements, without the authority of law.

¶ (2) Writ of detainer:

Law: A writ directed to the governor of a prison, commanding him to detain the prisoner till discharged.

dě-tain'-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DETAIN, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. The act of keeping or holding back what belongs to another.

2. The act of keeping or holding back; detention.

"A detaining therein by some stronger power than themselves."—Sir T. More: Works, p. 386.

3. The state or condition of being detained; detention.

"To show the cause of his detaining in prison."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iii., ch. ix.

dě-tain'-ment, s. [Eng. detain; -ment.] The act of detaining or keeping back; detention.

"Unless the cause of the detention in prison be returned."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iii., ch. ix.

dě-tār'-l-ūm, s. [From detar, the native name in Senegal.]

Bot.: A genus of leguminous plants, consisting of trees, natives of Senegal. Two species are known. Detarium senegalense furnishes a hard wood resembling mahogany, and two varieties of fruit, one sweet, the other bitter. The former is much sought after for food, but the latter is stated to be a strong poison. The succulent drupes of D. microcarpum are eaten by the negroes.

dě-tā'ste, v. t. [Pref. de=away, from, and Eng. taste (q. v.).] To dislike.

"Who now in darkness do detaste the day."

Stirling.

dět'-bünd, a. [Mid. Eng. det=debt, and Scotch bund=bound.] Predetermined; bound by a divine decree.

"As therto detbund in my wretched age."

Douglas: Virgil, 366, 29.

dě-těct', v. t. [Lat. detectus, pa. par. of detego=to uncover, to expose: de=away, from, and tego=to cover.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. To disclose, to discover, to expose.

"To let thy tongue detect thy base-born heart."

Shakespeare: Henry VI., Pt. III., il. 2.

2. To discover or find out, especially applied in science to the discovery or detection of substances existing in minute particles or quantities.

3. To discover or find out as a crime or guilt; to bring to light, to expose.

"Not a single man or woman who had the smallest interest in detecting the fraud had been suffered to be present."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. viii.

*4. To accuse, to bring to trial of, to inform against, to denounce.

"If he be denounced or detected unto him."—Sir T. More: Works, p. 219.

II. Chem.: To discover the presence of an element or chemical compound in a substance, by means of characteristic chemical reactions.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between detect and discover: "Detect is always taken in a bad sense; discover in an indifferent sense. A person is detected in what he wishes to conceal; a person or a thing is discovered that has unintentionally lain concealed. Thieves are detected in picking pockets; a lost child is discovered in a wood, or in some place of security. Detection is the act of the moment; it is effected by the aid of the senses; a discovery is the consequence of efforts, and is brought about by circuitous means, and the aid of the understanding. A plot is detected by any one who communicates what he has seen and heard; many murders have been discovered after a lapse of years by ways the most extraordinary. Nothing is detected but what is actually passing; many things are discovered which have long passed." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dět'-těct', a. [Lat. detectus, pa. par. of detego.] Accused, denounced, informed against.

"A priest named Sir Thomas Bagley was detect of heresy."—Fabyan: Chronicles (1581).

dět'-těct'-a-ble, dět'-těct'-i-ble, a. [Eng. detect; -able.] That may or can be detected; liable or open to detection.

"These errors are detectable at a glance."—Latham.

dět'-těct'-ěd, pa. par. or a. [DETECT, v.]

dět'-těct'-těr, s. [DETECTOR.]

dět'-těct'-i-ng, pr. par., a. & s. [DETECT, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of discovering, finding out, or exposing; detection.

dět'-těct'-tion, s. [Lat. detectio, from detectus, pa. par. of detego.]

1. The discovery or finding of anything; especially applied in science to the finding or discovering of minute particles or quantities.

"Not only the sea, but rivers and rains also, are instrumental to the detection of amber and other fossils."—Woodward.

2. A discovering, finding out, or exposing of a crime, guilt, &c.

"Dreading a detection which must be fatal to his honor."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

dět'-těct'-tive, s. & a. [Eng. detect; -ive.]

A. As subst.: One of a body of police officers, usually dressed in plain clothes, to whom are intrusted the detection of crimes and the apprehension of the offenders.

"If, however, the swell-mobman's eye is forever wandering in search of his prey, so is also that of the detective."—Quarterly Review.

B. As adj.: Employed or fitted for detection or discovery; as, detective police.

dět'-těct'-těr, dět'-těct'-těr, s. [Lat.]

I. Ord. Lang.: One who detects or brings anything to light.

"O heavens! That this treason were not, or not I the detector."—Shakespeare: Lear, iii. 5.

II. Technically:

1. Locksmithing: An arrangement in a lock, by which an overlifted tumbler is caught by detent, so as to indicate that the lock has been tampered with. In one of these devices the motion of the key throws out a number of wards, which engage the key and keep it from being withdrawn until the bolt is moved, when the pieces resume their normal position and release the key. Should the key fail to act upon the bolt, it cannot be withdrawn, but the lock must be destroyed to release it.

2. Boiler-making: A means of indicating that the water in a boiler has sunk below the point of safety. [LOW-WATER DETECTOR.]

3. Telegraphy: A portable galvanometer with a high and a low resistance actuating coil, constructed for the use of linemen and telegraph constructors when putting up, repairing, or testing lines.

dět'-těn'-ě-brāte, v. t. [Lat. de=away, from, and tenebratus=dark, darkened, pa. par. of tenebro=to darken; tenebro=darkness.] To remove darkness from, to make light or clear.

"... afford us any light to detenebrate and clear the truth."—Brown: Vulgar Errors, bk. vi., ch. vi.

dět'-těnt', s. [Fr. détente, from Lat. detentus=a holding back, from detineo=to hold back.] [DETAIN.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: In the same sense as II.

*2. Fig.: Anything which acts as a stop or hindrance.

"For aught I know, every one of you may be in this condition, requiring but the proper agent to be applied—the proper word to be spoken—to remove a detent."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3d ed.), pp. 103, 104.

II. Mech.: A pin, stud, or lever forming a stop in a watch, clock, tumbler-lock, or other machine. It is variously called in specific cases; as, click, pawl, dog, fence, &c. It is usually capable of motion, either at certain intervals, as in some escapements, or by operation of a key, as in locks. A detent-catch falls into the striking-wheel of a clock, and stops it from striking more than the right number of times. The watch escapement has also a detent. The ratchet-wheel has a click, to prevent back motion. The windlass has a pawl, to fall into the notches of the rim. (Knight.)

dět'-těn'-tion, s. [Fr. détention; Sp. detencion; Ital. detenzione, from Lat. detentio, from detentus, pa. par. of detineo.] [DETAIN, v.]

1. The act of detaining, keeping back, or withholding that which belongs to another.

"... the detention of long-since-due debts, Against my honor."—Shakespeare: Timon, ii. 2.

2. The act of delaying, hindering, or stopping from proceeding.

3. The act of detaining in custody; the state of being detained or kept in custody or confinement.

"Their detention under safe custody."—Spotswood: Church of Scotland (an. 1570).

4. The state of being hindered or delayed.

"Minding to proceede further south without long detention in those partes."—Hackluyt: Voyages, iii. 150.

¶ House of detention: A place where offenders or accused persons are kept in custody while under remand or till committed to prison.

dět'-těr', v. t. [Lat. deterreo=to frighten away; de=away, from, and terreo=to frighten.] To discourage or frighten from any act; to cause to cease, desist from, or abandon any practice, habit, or intention.

"Rather animated than deterred by the flames and falling buildings."—Anson: Voyage, bk. iii., ch. x.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between deter, to discourage, and to dishearten: "One is deterred from commencing any thing, one is discouraged or disheartened from proceeding. A variety of motives may deter any one from an undertaking; but a person is discouraged or disheartened mostly by the want of success or the hopelessness of the case. The wicked are sometimes deterred from committing enormities by the fear of punishment; projectors are discouraged from entering into fresh speculations by observing the failure of others; there are few persons who would not be disheartened from renewing their endeavors, who had experienced nothing but ill-success. The prudent and the fearful are alike easily to be deterred; impatient people are most apt to be discouraged; faint-hearted people are easiest disheartened. The foolhardy and the obdurate are the least easily deterred from their object; the persevering will not suffer themselves to be discouraged by particular failures; the resolute and self-confident will not be disheartened by trifling difficulties." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dět'-těr'ge, v. t. [Lat. detergo=to wipe off, from de=away, from, and tergo=to wipe.] To cleanse, clear, or wipe away foul or offensive matter from a wound or sore.

"Sea-salt ... detergeth the vessels, and keeps the fluids from putrefaction."—Arbuthnot.

dět'-těr'g'ed, pa. par. or a. [DETERGE.]

dět'-těr'-gěn'-čy, s. [Lat. detergens, pr. par. of detergo.] A cleansing or purifying power.

"Bath water ... possesses that milkiness, detergency, and muddling heat."—De Foe: Tour through Gr. Britain, il. 290. (Davies.)

dět'-těr'-gěnt, a. & s. [Lat. detergens, pr. par. of detergo=to wipe away.]

1. As adj.: Having the quality or property of cleansing or cleaning; detergent.

"The food ought to be nourishing and detergent."—Arbuthnot: On Diet.

2. As subst.: A medicine or preparation which has the quality or property of cleansing or clearing; a detergent.

"The virtues of the most valuable preparation ... are in a great degree answered by tar-water as a detergent."—Bp. Berkeley: Siris, § 23.

dět'-těr'g'-i-ng, pr. par., a. & s. [DETERGE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of cleansing or clearing from foul or offensive matter; detersion.

dět'-těr'-i-ōr-āt, dět'-těr'-i-ōr-āte, a. [Lat. deterioratus.] Injured, impaired, made worse, deteriorated.

dět'-těr'-i-ōr-āte, v. t. & i. [Lat. deterioratus, pa. par. of deterioro=to make worse; deterior=worse; de=away, from; -ter and -ior, comparative suffixes.]

A. Trans.: To make worse or inferior; to reduce or lower in quality or value.

"There were designed most magnificent cloysters, the brave design whereof Dr. J. Fell hath deteriorated with his new device."—Aubrey: Anecd., ii. 589.

B. Intrans.: To become worse or inferior; to become reduced or lowered in quality or value.

dět'-těr'-i-ōr-āt-ěd, pa. par. or a. [DETERIORATE.]

dět'-těr'-i-ōr-āt-i-ng, pr. par., a. & s. [DETERIORATE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

dě-těr-min-a-blŷ, adv. [Eng. determinable(e); -ly.] In a determinable manner.

dě-těr-min-ant, a. & s. [Fr. pr. par of determiner.]

A. As adj.: Serving or tending to determine; determinative.

B. As substantive:

I. Ord. Lang.: That which determines or tends to determine.

II. Technically:

1. Logic: A mark or attribute added to the subject and predicate, which narrows the extent of both, but renders them more definite, or better determined.

2. Math.: A name given to the sum of a series of products of several numbers, these products being formed according to certain specified laws. Thus the determinant of the nine numbers:

a, b, c
a', b', c'
a'', b'', c''

is $ab'c'' - ab''c' + a'b'c - a'b''c' - a'b'c'' + a'b''c'$.

dě-těr-min-ate, dě-těr-min-at, de-ter-myn-at, a. [Lat. determinatus, pa. par. of determino=to bound; de (intens.), and termino=to limit, to bound; terminus=a limit.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. Determined, fixed, settled, established.

"Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain."—Acts ii. 23.

*2. Fixed, ascertained, certain.

"The former of determinate date."—Whitney: Life and Growth of Language, p. 185.

*3. Limited, defined.

"Demonstrations in numbers . . . are more general in their use, and determinate in their application."—Locke.

*4. Concluded.

"My bonds in thee are all determinate."

Shakesp.: Sonnet 87.

*5. Decisive, conclusive, determined.

"Ere a determinate resolution, he (I mean the bishop) did require a respite."

Shakesp.: Henry VIII, ii. 4.

*6. Determined or decided upon.

"My determinate voyage is mere extravagancy."—Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, ii. 1.

*7. Determined, resolute.

"Like men dinned in a long peace, more determinate to do, than skillful how to do."—Stdney.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: Determinate inflorescence: That in which the axis is either elongated and ends in a solitary flower, which then terminates the axis, and if other flowers are produced they are secondary, and further from the center; or the axis is shortened, and produces at once a number of flower-buds, but of these the central flower expands first, being in fact the termination of the axis, while the other flowers are developed in succession farther from the center. Called also Centrifugal, Definite, or Terminal inflorescence. (Balfour.)

2. Mathematics:

(1) Determinate equation: One which admits of a finite number of solutions. Every equation which contains but one unknown quantity, and which is not identical, is determinate. If a group of equations be independent of each other, and equal in number to the number of unknown quantities which they contain, the group is determinate, and there will be but a finite number of sets of values for the unknown quantities.

(2) Determinate geometry: That branch of geometry which has for its object the solution of determinate problems.

(3) Determinate problem: One which admits of a finite number of solutions.

(4) Determinate quantity: One which admits of but a finite number of values. Thus in an equation which contains but one unknown quantity, that quantity is said to be determinate.

(5) Determinate series: A series whose terms proceed by the powers of a determinate quantity; as, $1 + \frac{1}{2} + (\frac{1}{2})^2 + (\frac{1}{2})^3 + \dots (\frac{1}{2})^n$, &c.

dě-těr-min-āte, v. t. [DETERMINE, a.] To circumscribe, to limit, to determine.

"The slow hours shall not determine The dateless limit of thy dear exile."

Shakesp.: Richard II, i. 3.

dě-těr-min-āte-lŷ, adv. [Eng. determine; -ly.]

1. With certainty, certainly, precisely.

"If the affections of angels and men had been determinately fixed by their creation."—Mountagu: Devout Essays, pt. ii., treat. iii., § 1.

2. With determination or resolution; resolutely.

"In those errors they are so determinately settled, that they pay unto falsity the whole sum of whatsoever love is owing unto God's truth."—Hooker: Eccles. Polity.

dě-těr-min-āte-něss, s. [Eng. determine; -ness.]

1. The state or quality of being determinate, settled, or fixed.

2. The state or quality of being determined; determination, resolution.

"His determinateness and his power seemed to make allies unnecessary."—Miss Austen: Mansfield Park, ch. xiv.

dě-těr-min-ā-tion, dě-těr-min-ā-čion, s. [Fr. determination; Sp. determinación; Ital. determinazione, from Lat. determinatio=a boundary. [DETERMINE.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of ending, concluding, or limiting.

"The great appearance there was of a speedy determination of that war . . ."—Ludlow: Memoirs, i. 339.

2. The act of determining, deciding, or settling.

"Let us give it the priority in our determinations."—State Trials: Bishop of Ely (1640).

3. The act or process of determining or ascertaining by scientific means.

" . . . to explain the principles, by which astronomical observation is applied to geographical determinations."—Herschel: Astronomy (5th ed.), § 205.

4. The result of a scientific investigation or observation.

"Chronology, moreover, without which political history cannot exist, is dependent upon astronomical determinations."—Lewis: Astron. of the Ancients (1862), ch. i., § 1.

5. A decision of a question in the mind; a conclusion or resolution formed.

" . . . for my determination is to gather the nations."—Zephaniah iii. 8.

6. Strength or firmness of mind; resolution; resolve.

"Remissness can by no means consist with a constant determination of will or desire to the greatest apparent good."—Locke.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: The ascertaining of the exact amount or proportion of any chemical compound or element in a substance.

2. Law:

(1) The hearing and deciding upon questions judicially.

(2) The putting an end to; as, the determination of an estate or interest.

3. Logic: The defining a notion or concept by limiting it by the addition of differentia.

4. Med.: A rapid afflux or flow; as, the determination of blood to the brain, &c.

5. Nat. Science: The referring or assigning of plants, minerals, &c., to the species to which they belong.

dě-těr-min-ā-tive, adj. & s. [Eng. determinat(e); -ive.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. Having the quality or property of determining; conclusive, final.

"That individual action, which is justly punished as sinful in us, cannot proceed from the special influence and determinative power of a just cause."—Bramhall: Against Hobbes.

*2. Fixed, determined.

"The determinative time of three days."—Hale: Cont., vol. ii.; Christ Crucified.

*3. Tending or designed to determine the species, class, &c., to which various things belong.

"The determinative particles are more often prefixed than suffixed."—Whitney: Life and Growth of Language, p. 243.

II. Logic: Limiting.

"If the term added to make up the complex subject does not necessarily or constantly belong to it, then it is determinative."—Watts: Logic, pt. ii., ch. ii.

B. As subst.: A word or sign prefixed or suffixed to a word for the purpose of determining its meaning; a determinant.

dě-těr-min-ā-tŷr, s. [Lat.] One who or that which determines, or tends to determine, settle, or decide.

"They have recourse unto the great determinator of virginity, conceptions, fertility, and the inscrutable infirmities of the whole body."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

dě-těr-mine, de-ter-myne, v. t. & i. [Fr. déterminer; Sp. & Port. determinar; Ital. determinare, from Lat. determino=to limit, to bound; de (intens.), and termino=to bound; terminus=a bound, a limit.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To bound, to end, to conclude.

*2. To put an end to, to kill.

"Now, where is he that will not stay so long Till his friend sickness hath determined me?"

Shakesp.: Henry IV, Pt. II., iv. 5.

3. To fix the limits or bounds of, to set out, to prearrange.

"God hath determined the times before appointed."—Acts xvii. 26.

*4. To limit, to bound, to confine, to shut in.

"No sooner have they climbed that hill, which thus determines their view at a distance, but a new prospect is opened."—Atterbury.

5. To limit or confine, to assign in definition.

"The principium individuationis is existence itself, which determines a being of any sort to a particular time and place."—Locke.

6. To decide, to settle.

"To determine this either way, is to beg the question . . ."—Locke.

7. To resolve or decide on.

"It was, however, determined to slaughter them for food."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

*8. To fix irrevocably, to settle finally.

"Till the concluding stroke Determines all, and closes our design."

Addison.

9. To influence the choice or decision; to give an impulse to the judgment.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: To ascertain the amount or proportion of a chemical compound or element in a substance.

2. Law:

(1) To hear and decide on a case judicially.

(2) To end, to put an end to, as an estate or interest.

3. Logic: To define a notion or concept by the addition of determinants.

"From the broad class of diseases we determine or mark out the class of fevers by the peculiar symptoms of heat, rapid pulse, &c., which are their marks."—Thomson: Laws of Thought, § 63.

*B. Reflex.: To form a resolution or determination with; to resolve with.

"To bynde and determine him self to serve our lordes god."—Caxton: Dictes and Sayings (1477).

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fāll; try, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

C. Intransitive:

1. To end, to terminate, to come to an end.

"All pleasure springing from a gratified passion, as most of the pleasure of sin does, must needs determine with that passion."—South.

*2. To finish, to make an end, to decide a point.

"One stroke they aim'd

That might determine

3. To come to a determination or decision; to decide, to settle.

"It was then necessary to determine whether the rule laid down in 1679 . . . was to be accounted the law of the land."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iv.

¶ Sometimes followed by of.

"Now, noble peers, the cause why we are met Is—to determine of the coronation."

—Shakesp.: Richard III., iii. 4.

4. To make up one's mind firmly and strongly, to resolve.

"In a few days it became clear that Schomberg had determined not to fight."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between to determine and to resolve: "To determine is more especially an act of the judgment; to resolve is an act of the will; the former requires examination and choice; we determine how or what we shall do; the latter requires a firm spirit: we resolve that we will do what we have determined upon. . . . In the ordinary concerns of life we have frequent occasion to determine without resolving; in the discharge of our moral duties, or the performance of any office, we have occasion to resolve without determining: the master determines to dismiss his servant; the servant resolves on becoming more diligent. Personal convenience or necessity gives rise to the determination; a sense of duty, honor, fidelity, and the like, gives birth to the resolution. A traveler determines, to take a certain route; a learner resolves to conquer every difficulty in the acquirement of learning. Humor or change of circumstances occasions a person to alter his determination; timidity, fear, or defect in principle, occasions the resolution to waver. Children are not capable of determining; and their best resolutions fall before the gratification of the moment. Those who determine hastily are frequently under the necessity of altering their determinations; there are no resolutions so weak as those that are made on a sick bed; the return of health is quickly succeeded by a recurrence to the former course of life. In science, to determine is to fix the mind, or to cause it to rest in a certain opinion; to resolve is to lay open what is obscure, to clear the mind from doubt and hesitation. We determine points of question; we resolve difficulties." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between to determine and to decide, see DECIDE; for that between to determine and to fix, see FIX.

C. As subst.: The act of causing to explode with a sudden report; the act of exploding.
detonating-gas, s. A mixture of two volumes of hydrogen with one volume of oxygen, which detonates violently when ignited, or an electric spark is passed through it, water being formed.
detonating-hammer, s. The hammer of a percussion gun-lock.

detonating-powder, s. A powder which explodes by a blow. The compound used in the priming of percussion-caps and fuses is the fulminate of mercury or of silver, collected as a precipitate when the metal, dissolved in nitric acid, is poured into warm alcohol. The precipitate is collected, washed, and dried. Chloride of nitrogen, NCl_3 , teriodide of nitrogen, NI_3 , potassium picrate, $\text{C}_6\text{H}_3(\text{NO}_2)_3\text{OK}$, a mixture of potassium chlorate, KClO_3 , with sulphur, phosphorus, sugar, &c., are most powerful detonating substances. A mixture of equal volumes of chlorine and hydrogen exposed to direct sunlight detonates violently, forming hydrochloric acid gas which occupies the same volume as the original mixture.

Blasting: A primer exploded by a fuse, and used in blasting operations to violently explode gun-cotton, instead of the former plan by which the charge of gun-cotton was simply ignited.

detonating-tube, s. A graduated tube used for the detonation of gases. It is pierced by two opposed wires by which an electric spark is introduced. The gas is confined over water or mercury. [EUDIOMETER.]

"Errors, superstitions, heresies, and impieties, which had detruded the face of the Church."—Ep. Taylor: Diss. from Popery, ch. I., § 11.

dě-tūr-pā-tion, s. [Lat. deturpatus.] The act of defiling or corrupting; a corruption.

"And the remaining part have passed through the limbes and strainers of heretics, and monks, and ignorants, and interested persons, and have passed through the corrections and deturpations, and mistakes of transcribers."—Ep. Taylor: Rule of Conscience, bk. II., ch. III.

deuce (1), s. [Fr. deux; Lat. duo=two.] Two; the number two on a card or a die; the card marked with two pips.

deuce-ace, s. The one and two thrown at dice.

"Then, I am sure, you know how much the gross sum of deuce-ace amounts to."—Shakespeare: Love's Labor's Lost, I. 2.

deuce (2), duse, deus, deuse, s. [Old Fr. deus; Lat. deus=God, voc. of deus=God. (Skeat.)]

*1. An exclamation or oath, invoking the Deity.
"Deus! lemmen, what may this be?"
Havelok, 1,312.

2. An evil spirit, the devil.

"'Twas the prettiest prologue, as he wrote it!
Well, the deuce take me if I ha'n't forgot it."
Congreve: Old Bachelor (Prolog.).

deuc-ēd, a. & adv. [Eng. deuce (2); -ed.] Confounded, devilish.

deuc-ēd-ly, adv. [Eng. deuced; -ly.] Confoundedly, devilishly.

deuch, s. [Gael. deoch.]

1. A draught, a drink.

2. Drink in general.

deuch-an-dorach, deuch-an-doris, doch-an-doris, dock-an-dorach, dok-and-doris, s. [Gael. deoch an doruis.] A drink taken at the door of a house at parting; a parting or stirrup cup.

deu-tēr-ō-ca-nōn-ic-a-l, a. [Greek deuteros=second, and Eng. canonical (q. v.).]

An epithet applied to those books of Scripture which were admitted as canonical after the rest [CANON], either by reason that they were not written till after the compilation of the canon, or on account of some hesitation concerning their inspiration. The deuterocanonical books of the modern canon are the Book of Esther, either the whole, or at least the last seven chapters; the Epistle to the Hebrews, those of St. James, St. Jude, Second of St. Peter, Second and Third of St. John, and the Revelation.

deu-tēr-ō-g-a-mist, s. [Gr. deuteros=second, gamos=marriage, and Eng. suff. -ist.] One who marries a second time.

"He had published for me against the deuterogamists of the age."—Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield, ch. xviii.

deu-tēr-ō-g-a-my, s. [Gr. deuterogamia = a second marriage.] [DEUTEROGAMIST.] A second marriage; the practice of marrying a second time.

"That unfortunate divine who has so long . . . fought against the deuterogamy of the age."—Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield, ch. xiv.

deu-tēr-ō-nōm-ic, a. [Gr. deuteros=second, and nomikos=pertaining to the law; nomos=law.] Pertaining to or contained in the Book of Deuteronomy.

"The Deuteronomio law designs to make such syncretism henceforth impossible."—Prof. R. Smith: Old Test. in Jewish Church, § xii., p. 353.

deu-tēr-ōn-ō-mist, s. [English, &c., deuteronomist (q. v.); -ist.]

Bible Criticism: The author of Deuteronomy.

deu-tēr-ōn-ō-mis-tic, a. [Eng. deuteronomist; -ic.]

Bible Criticism: Emanating from the "Deuteronomist" (q. v.).

"While xxxi.-xxxiv. contains also Deuteronomistic matter, but mixed with passages of very different age and authorship."—Colenso: Pentateuch and Book of Joshua, pt. vi., pref. vii.

Deu-tēr-ōn-ō-my, s. [Latin Deuteronomium; Gr. Deuteronomion=the Second or Repeated Law; deuteros=second, and nomos=law.]

Scrip. Canon: The fifth book of the Pentateuch. It is called in Hebrew Elleh haddebarim, these being the first words of the book. Occasionally it is written simply debarim, which, it will be perceived, is one of the foregoing three words. In the opening verse a heading or title, either to the whole or part of the book, apparently the former, is thus given: "These be the words which Moses spake unto all Israel on this side Jordan in the wilderness, in the plain over against the Red Sea, between Paran and Tophel, and Laban, and Hazeroth, and Dizahab." The third verse gives us the date of these words, the fortieth year (doubtless of the wandering), the eleventh month, and the first day of the month. The whole book, to the end of ch. xxxii., is the form of an oral address from the Jewish leader, a detailed restatement of the law, moral, ceremonial, and judicial (i. e., civil and criminal) [see the etym.], coming in as part of his discourse. Toward the close, in ch. xxviii., a prophetic statement is made of the future prosperity with which the people should be blessed if they obeyed the divine law, and the calamities which should befall them if they were disobedient to its commands. The Jewish Church universally attributed the authorship of Deuteronomy to Moses, the record of his own death being, however, admitted to be by a later hand. Our Lord quoted it as part of Scripture. (Compare Matt. iv. 4, Luke iv. 4, with Deut. viii. 3; Matt. iv. 10, Luke iv. 8, with Deut. vi. 13; and Matt. iv. 7, Luke iv. 12, with Deut. vi. 16.) The Apostle Peter and Stephen the Martyr similarly accepted it, and applied the prediction in ch. xviii. 15, 18, 19, to Christ (Acts iii. 22, 23; vii. 37). The Christian Church of all ages, and in all its ramifications, has almost universally accepted the Book of Deuteronomy as canonical, and as penned except the few concluding verses, by Moses. This opinion has been held by such scholars as Moses Stuart, Hengstenberg, and Hävernick. The modern school of rationalistic critics, on the other hand, almost with one accord, reject the Mosaic authorship. Stähelin attributes the work to the Jehovist; Gesenius, De Wette, and others believe the Jehovist and the Deuteronomist distinct. The latter is supposed by Ewald, Riehm, Bleek, Davidson, and Kalsch to have written it in Manasseh's time; while De Wette, Von Bohlen, Knobel, Graf, Koster, Noldeke, Colenso, and, after a change of view, Kuenen, consider him to have done so in the early part of Josiah's reign. Colenso is of opinion that the original address of Moses consisted only of chapters v.-xxvi., xxviii., to which ch. i.-iv., xxix., xxx. were afterward added by the same hand, while chapters xxxi.-xxxiv. contain also Deuteronomistic matter, but mixed with passages of a different age and authorship. Prof. Robertson Smith also holds the late date, and consequently the non-Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy, combining, however, this opinion in historic criticism with belief in evangelic doctrines. A prevalent view with critics of the last-mentioned school is that the prophet Jeremiah was the author of a great part, if not of the whole, of Deuteronomy.

deu-tēr-ō-pāth-ic, a. [Eng. deutero-path (q. v.); -ic.] Relating to, or of the nature of, deutero-pathy.

deu-tēr-ōp-a-thy, deu-tēr-ō-pāth-ic-a, s. [Gr. deuteros=second, and pathē, pathos=suffering, pain; paschō=to suffer.]

Med.: A sympathetic affection of one part with another; a secondary disease.

deu-tēr-ōs-cō-py, s. [Gr. deuteros=second, and skopeō=to see, to look at.]

1. Lit.: Second sight. (Scott.)

2. Fig.: The second, inner, or hidden meaning or intention of words.

"Not attaining the deuteroscopy, or second intention of the words."—Brownie: Vulgar Errors.

deu-tēr-ō-zō-ōid, s. [Gr. deuteros=second, and Eng. zōid (q. v.).]

Zool.: A term applied to a zoöid produced by gemmation from a zoöid.

deu-tēr-ōzō-u-rēt, deu-tō-hy-drōg-u-rēt, s. [Gr. deuteros=second; Eng. hydroguret (q. v.).]

Chem.: A compound of two atoms of hydrogen with one of some other element.

deu-tō, pref. [Gr. deuteros=second.]

Chem., &c.: In composition used to express that two atoms of the substance named are combined with one or more of another. The proper use of the prefix deuto is to denote the second in order of the terms of any series; thus, in the several series of oxides FeO, Fe₂O₃; MnO, Mn₂O₃, MnO₂; PbO, Pb₂O₃, PbO₂, the compounds Fe₂O₃, Mn₂O₃, PbO are, properly speaking, the deutoxides of the respective metals, the deuto denoting simply the place of the compound in the series, not its atomic composition. But the prefix has often been confounded with bi- or di-, which properly refers to the constitution of the compound, as compared with that of the proto- or mono- compounds of the same series. (Watts.)

deu-tō-plāsm, s. [Pref. deuto, and Gr. plasma = anything formed or molded.]

Biol.: A term applied to that portion of the yolk of ova which furnishes nourishment for the embryo and its accessories. [PROTOPLASM.]

deu-t-ōx-ide, deu-t-ōx-yde, s. [Pref. deuto, and Eng. oxide (q. v.).]

Chem.: A compound of two atoms of oxygen to one or more of a metal. A term formerly used to denote the second oxide of an element but not its atomic composition; thus the second oxides, Fe₂O₃, Mn₂O₃, SnO₂, are the respective deutoxides of iron, manganese, and tin.

deut'-zi-a (or as dóit'-zi-a), s. [Named after John Deutz, a Dutch naturalist.]

Bot.: A genus of shrubs, natives of the East Indies, belonging to the natural order Philadelphaceae, or Syringae. The leaves are opposite, deciduous, and exstipulate, and, especially in the case of Deutzia scabra, are covered with beautiful star-like hairs or scales. The leaves are used in Japan for polishing purposes, and their inner bark for poultices.

deu-zan, s. [Etym. uncertain.] A species of apple.

"Tis not the lasting deuzan I require, Nor yet the red-cheek'd queening I request."
Quarles: Emblems.

dē-váll, *de-váll, *de-val, v. i. & t. [Fr. dévaler, from Low Lat. devallo=to descend: de=down, and vallis=a valley.]

1. Intrans.: To descend, to fall low, to subside.

"The tempest low in the deep devalis."
Douglas: Virgil, 200, 29.

2. Trans.: To let fall, to bow, to lower.

"Thank and greet God, their heidid law deuall."
Palace of Honor, ii. 53.

dē-váll (1), s. [O. Fr. devallée.] A sunk fence, a haw-haw.

dē-váll (2), *de-vald, s. [DEVAL, v.] A stop, cessation, intermission.

dē-váll, *de-vald, v. i. [O. Fr. defallir; Fr. défaillir.] To cease, to leave off.

"Devall, then, sirs."—Fergusson: Poems, ii. 99.

dē-vāp-ōr-ā-tion, s. [Pref. de=down, away, and Eng. vaporate (q. v.).] The change of vapor into water, as in the generation of rain.

dē-vāst, v. t. [Fr. dévaster; Lat. devasto: de=fully, and vasto=to lay waste; vastus=waste.] To lay waste, to devastate, to desolate.

"From wounds her eagles suck the reeking blood,
And all-devasting war provides her food."
Sandys: Paraphrase of Job, p. 58.

dēv-ās-tāte, v. t. [Lat. devastatus, pa. par. of devasto=to devastate.] [DEVAST.] To lay waste, to ravage, to desolate, to harry.

Argyle had found his principality devastated, and his tribe disarmed and disorganized."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

dēv-ās-tāt-ēd, pa. par. or a. [DEVASTATE.]

dēv-ās-tāt-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DEVASTATE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of laying waste, plundering, or ravaging; devastation.

dēv-ās-tā-tion, s. [Fr. dévastation; Sp. devastación; Ital. devastazione, from Lat. devastatio, from devastatus, pa. par. of devasto.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of devastating, laying waste, or plundering a country.

"By devastation the rough warrior gains,
And farmers fatten most when famine reigns."
Garth: Dispensary, ii. 66, 66.

2. The state of being devastated or laid waste; desolation.

"That flood which overflowed Attica, in the days of Ogyges, made cruel havoc and devastation among them."
—Woodward.

II. Law: The waste of the goods of a deceased person by the executor or administrator.

dēv-ās-tā-tōr, s. [Low Lat. devastator; Ital. devastatore.] One who devastates, plunders, or lays waste; a plunderer.

"He marched against the devastators of the Palatinate."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

dē-vās-tā-vit, s. [Lat.=he has wasted, 3d pers. sing. perf. indic. of devasto=to waste.]

Law: A writ which lies against an executor or administrator, who wastes or misapplies the goods of a deceased person.

dē-vās-ti-tā-tion, s. [Lat. de=fully, and vastitus=a wilderness, a waste.] A destruction, devastation, or laying waste.

"Wherefore followed a pitiful devastation of Churches."—Heylin: Hist. Presbyt., p. 164. (Davies.)

dē-vāunt, v. i. [Pref. de, and Eng. vault (q. v.).] To vault, to boast.

"Which we did . . . devaunt to keep moost exactly."
—Fuller: Church History, vi. 320.

dēv-ēl, dev-vel, s. [Etym. doubtful, probably connected with DEVIL.] A very heavy blow, a severe stroke. (Scotch.)

"Ao gude downright devel will split it, I'ee warrant ye!"—Scott: Antiquary, ch. xiv.

dēv-ēl-lēr, s. [Eng. devel; -er.] A boxer, a pugilist, a dexterous young fellow.

dē-vēl-ōp, dē-vēl-ōpe, v. t. & i. [Fr. développer=to unfold: de=Lat. dis=apart, from, and veloper=to fold, found in enveloper. (Skeat.)]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To uncover, to disengage from something which enfolded and conceals; to disclose, to bring to light gradually.

"To develop the latent excellencies . . . of our art."
—Sir J. Reynolds: Disc., xv.

2. To give rise and encouragement to; to further, to promote.

"Indeed, law and police, trade and industry, have done far more . . . to develop in our minds a sense of the wilder beauties of nature."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

3. To form by natural growth.

"The other flowers are developed in succession farther from the center."—Balfour: Botany, § 332.

4. To work out, to perfect, to complete.

"Each inherits from his ancestors a physical constitution which makes him develop unconsciously the same speech as theirs."—Whitney: Life and Growth of Language, ch. i., p. 9.

II. Technically:

1. Biol.: To impart or furnish the impulse or power to organisms, to enable them to go through the process of evolution.

2. Math.: To change the form of an expression by the carrying out of certain indicated operations, without changing the value of the expression. Thus, in the equation $(x+a)^3 = x^3 + 3ax^2 + 3a^2x + a^3$, the first member is the indicated cube of $x+a$, and the second member its development.

3. Phot.: To call into visible existence the latent picture produced in the camera or under a negative. [DEVELOPMENT.]

B. Intransitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To advance or progress from one stage to another; to expand.

"There is an undertone of strength, that may at any time develop into a trying movement."—Century Magazine.

2. To be evolved or spring from by natural growth.

3. To become visible, known, or manifest; to come to light.

II. Technically:

1. Biol.: To advance stage by stage by gradual evolution from the lowest to the highest, or perfect stage.

2. Phot.: To become visible by the process of development.

¶ For the difference between to develop and to unfold, see UNFOLD.

dē-vēl-ōp-a-ble, a. [Eng. develop; -able.] That may or can be developed. (See example under DEVELOPMENT.)

dē-vēl-ōped, pa. par. or a. [DEVELOP.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Disclosed, advanced, furthered, formed.

II. Technically:

1. Phot.: Made visible by development.

2. Her.: Unfurled, as colors flying.

dē-vēl-ōp-ēr, s. [English develop; -er.] One who, or that which, develops.

dē-vēl-ōp-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DEVELOP.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: The act of disclosing, furthering, advancing, or making evident; the state of becoming developed.

2. Phot.: The same as DEVELOPMENT, II. 3.

developing-stick, s.

Phot.: A stick used for holding the glass while being developed. The developing-stick has a suction-pad of india-rubber, by which it is made to cling to the glass, allowing great freedom of motion without danger of becoming detached. (Knight.)

dē-vēl-ōp-mént, s. [Fr. développement.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of developing, disclosing, furthering, or advancing gradually, stage by stage.

"The new development of those powers disgusted and alarmed him."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

2. The state or condition of being developed; full, open exhibition.

3. The state of advancing or rising gradually more and more nearly to perfection; growth and advancement.

II. Technically:

1. Biol.: The gradual advance stage by stage of animal or vegetable bodies from the embryonic to the perfect state. [¶ (2).]

2. Math.: The act or process of developing an expression by the execution of certain indicated operations. Also the new form of an expression resulting from such process. [DEVELOP, A. II. 2.]

3. Phot.: The treatment of an exposed sensitive photographic surface with certain reducing agents, so as to call into visible existence the latent picture produced in the camera or under a negative—an operation always performed in an actinically dark room. (Knight.)

4. Shipbuilding: The process of drawing the figures which given lines on a curved surface would assume, if that surface were a flexible sheet and were spread out flat upon a plane without alteration of area and without distortion. Surfaces not truly developable are drafted on a plane surface by the process termed Expansion (q. v.). (Knight.)

5. Biol.: [¶ (2).]

6. Music: A word used in two somewhat different senses: on the one hand of a whole movement, in a sense analogous to its use with reference to an organism; and on the other of a subject or phrase, with reference to the manner in which its conspicuous features of rhythm or melody are employed by reiteration, variation, or any other devices which the genius or ingenuity of the composer suggests, with the object of showing the various elements of interest it contains. . . . The development of a movement is rightly the development of the ideas contained in its subjects. (Grove.)

¶ (1) Development of a surface:

Math.: If a single curved surface be rolled upon a plane till every element comes in contact with the plane, that portion of it which is touched is called the development of the curved surface.

(2) Development hypothesis or theory:

Biol.: A hypothesis or theory which contends that species were not each of them a separate creation, but by some process or other came from previous species, the only exception, if any, existing being one or more primordial forms. By a similar process arose also the greater differences of structure on which have been founded genera, families, orders, classes, and even higher groups. Every one has taken note that man comes into the world as an infant, and that bodily and mental development, operating by means of changes so gradual as to escape notice at the time, make that infant successively pass through childhood, youth, and so on to full maturity. Growth, still continuing, is now less apparent than before, and finally, counter causes arrest, overcome it, and produce decline. It is the same with the inferior animals. Thus, in the Index to Prof. Owen's Lectures on the Comparative Anatomy of the Invertebrate Animals thirteen entries occur commencing with the word development, the animals indicated being the Acalephæ, the Anellata, the Arachnida, &c. Similarly, plants grow from seeds; the oak being ultimately produced by the acorn. Thus development is the law of the individual both in the Animal and in the Vegetable Kingdom. Among the several races of mankind there is a tendency to progression from a less to a more civilized state, which again is development in another form. If it exist clearly in the individual and in the human, if not even in all species, the inquiry, according to the upholders of this theory, is inevitable, May it not also do so in genera, in families, orders, &c.? May not the more highly-organized animals and plants have in some occult way developed from the lower ones, and the time-honored view that species—each of them a separate creation—are so nearly constant that they can run only into varieties, require modification?

Buffon, in a vacillating way, believed in the transformation of species. Lamarck strongly contended for the same view, first publishing his opinions on the subject in A. D. 1801; stating them at greater length in 1809 in his Philosophie Zoologique, and in 1815, in the introduction to his Hist. Nat. des Animaux sans Vertèbres. He maintained that all species, man himself not excluded, had descended from other species existing at a prior time. As early as A. D. 1795 Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire suspected that all known species are degenerations of one primitive type; he did not, however, publish his views till 1828. In 1844 appeared a work called Festivals of the Natural History of Creation, which by 1853 was in its tenth edition, and strongly advocated the Development hypothesis. Many replies to this work were given, the most celebrated being Hugh Miller's Footprints of the Creator; or, the Asterolepis of Stromness. The eminent metaphysician, Mr. Herbert Spencer, in an essay which appeared in the Leader in March, 1852, and republished in his Essays in 1858, contrasted the theories of Creation and Development, and intimated his belief in the latter.

The last-named year commenced a new epoch in the history of the Development hypothesis. July 1, 1858, a paper was read by Mr. Alfred Wallace, and another by Mr. Charles Darwin, on Natural Selection, a modification of the Development hypothesis, to which each had come independently; the fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thäre; pine, pīt, sire, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; try, Sýrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

former on observation and reflection while studying the natural history of the Malay Archipelago, the latter by powerful and long-continued thought on the phenomena of organic life which he had witnessed during his voyage round the world in the "Beagle" surveying vessel from 1832 to 1836. This is the form in which the Development hypothesis now flourishes. For details, see DARWINISM. Darwin's celebrated book, entitled The Origin of Species, first appeared in 1859, and his Descent of Man in 1871. Mr. Wallace's work on Natural Selection came forth in 1870. One of the earliest converts to the new doctrines was Prof. Huxley, who has done an immense deal to defend them and render them popular. In Germany the same views are earnestly advocated and carried out to an extreme length by Prof. Hæckel in his History of Creation, published in 1873, and of which an English translation appeared in 1875. What was formerly termed Development, and sometimes more vaguely the Transmutation of Species, is now often called Evolution (q. v.).

dě-vě-ōp-měn-taj, a. [Eng. development; -al.] Pertaining to or formed by development.

"The developmental changes proceeded."—Beale: Bio-plasm (1872), § 44.

dē-vē-nūs-tāte, v. t. [Lat. devenusto, from de=away, from, and venustus (genit. venustatis)=beauty.] To deprive of beauty or grace; to disfigure.

"They would rejoice to see what yet remains of beauty and order devenustated, and exposed to shame and dishonor."—Waterhouse: Apology for Learning (1653), p. 245.

dě-věst, v. t. & i. [O. Fr. devestir; Fr. dévetir, from dé=Lat. dis=apart, from, and vêtir; Lat. vestio=to clothe; vestis=a dress.]

A. Transitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: To strip, to deprive or divest of clothes, to undress.

"In Quarter and in terms like Bride and Groomer Devesting them for Bed."
Shakespeare: Othello, ii. 3. (Folio.)

2. Figuratively:

(1) To free or clear from.

"How to devest it [articular confession] from its evil appendages."—Bishop Taylor: Dissuasive from Popery, pt. i., bk. i., § 11.

(2) To annul, to deprive, to make forfeited.

"What are those breaches of the law of nature and nations, which do forfeit and devest all right and title in a nation to government?"—Bacon.

II. Law: To alienate as to title or right.

B. Intransitive:

Law: To be lost or alienated, as a title or estate.
† Except in the legal sense this word is now written divest (q. v.).

dě-věst-ěd, pa. par. or a. [DEVEST.]

dě-věst-ihg, pr. par., a. & s. [DEVEST.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: The act of undressing, depriving of, or stripping.

2. Law: The act of alienating; the state of becoming alienated.

dē-vēs-tūre, s. [Pref. de=away, from, and Eng. vesture (q. v.).] The act of putting off or leaving aside.

"For his own decarnation, as I may say, and devesture of carnality."—Montagu: Devout Essays, Treat. ii., § i.

dē-vēx, *dē-vēxe, a. & s. [Lat. devevus, pa. par. of deveho=to carry down; de=down, and veho=to carry.]

A. As adj.: Bending or bent downward.

B. As subst.: A curve, deviousity.

"Upon the western lands, Following the world's devev, he meant to tread."
May: Lucan's Pharsalia, x.

dē-vēx-i-tŷ, s. [O. Fr. devezité; Lat. devevit, from devevus.] A curving or incurvation downward; a declivity.

"The Heaven's devevity."—Davies: Wit's Pilgrimage.
dē-vi-ant, *dē-vi-aunt, a. [Fr., pr. par. of dévier=to go out of the way, to deviate.] Deviating, wandering, straying.

"From yon schole so deviant I am."
Romaine of the Rose.

dē-vi-āte, v. i. & t. [Lat. deviatus, pa. par. of devio=to go out of the way; de=away, from, and vio=a way.]

A. Intransitive:

1. Lit.: To go, digress, or turn aside from one's right course.

"The Captain's solicitude to arrive at Otaheite put it out of his power to deviate from his direct track."—Cook: Travels, vol. v. (Intro.)

II. Figuratively:

1. To wander or swerve from the usual or established course or rule.

"They deviated as little as possible from the ordinary methods prescribed by the law."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

2. To swerve, to digress, to err, to stray from the path of duty.

3. To diverge, to vary, to differ, to depart, to deflect.

"It was absolutely necessary that the copy should deviate from the original."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

B. Transitive:

1. Lit.: To cause to deviate.

"They were further authorized to deviate that line, and construct certain new lines and works."—London Times.

2. Fig.: To lead astray; to cause to wander or err.

"To let them deviate him from the right path."—Cotton: Montaigne, ch. xxxv. (Davies.)

† (1) Crabb thus discriminates between to deviate, to wander, to swerve, and to stray: "Deviate always supposes a direct path; wander includes no such idea. The act of deviating is commonly faulty, that of wandering is indifferent: they may frequently exchange significations; the former being justifiable by necessity; and the latter arising from an unsteadiness of mind. Deviate is mostly used in the moral acceptance; wander may be used in either sense. A person deviates from any plan or rule laid down; he wanders from the subject in which he is engaged. As no rule can be laid down which will not admit of an exception, it is impossible but the wisest will find it necessary in their moral conduct to deviate occasionally; yet every wanton deviation from an established practice evinces a culpable temper on the part of the deviator. Those who wander into the regions of metaphysics are in great danger of losing themselves; it is with them as with most wanderers, that they spend their time at best but idly. To swerve is to deviate from that which one holds right; to stray is to wander in the same bad sense: the young stray from the path of rectitude to seek that of pleasure." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between to deviate and to digress, see DIGRESS.

dē-vi-ā-tion, s. [Fr., from Low Lat. deviatio, from Lat. deviatus.]

A. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: The act of wandering or diverging from the direct or proper course.

II. Figuratively:

1. A variation or departure from the usual or established course or rule.

"... when any deviation, whether for the better or for the worse, from the established course of proceeding, is proposed."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxv.

2. A wandering, digressing, or departing from the path of duty.

"Worthy persons, if inadvertently drawn into a deviation, endeavor instantly to recover their lost ground."—Richardson: Clarissa.

3. A digression, a wandering from the subject.

"I shall make what deviations and excursions I shall think fit, as I proceed in my random essays."—Shaftesbury: Miscellaneous Reflections, ch. i.

B. Technically:

*1. Astron.: A motion of the deferent either toward or from the ecliptic.

2. Comm.: The voluntary departure of a vessel without necessity from the regular and usual course of the specific voyage insured, which discharges the underwriters from their responsibility.

"It has been laid down that a deviation made expressly for the object of succoring ships in distress does not discharge the underwriter."—London Daily Telegraph.

3. Eng. Rail. Engin.: The distance or extent to which a line when complete may legally differ from the original deposited plans. [Limit of deviation.]

4. Naut.: The departure or difference of a ship's compass from the true magnetic meridian, caused by the presence of iron. This depends, in iron ships, upon the direction with regard to the magnetic meridian in which the ship was laid down, the deviation being least when the ship has been built with her head pointing south. [COMPASS.]

"Their humor yet so various—
They manifest their whole life through
The needle's deviations too,
Their love is so precarious."

Couper: Friendship.

† (1) Deviation of the compass: [DEVIATION, B. 4.]

(2) Deviation of a falling body: The deviation from a perpendicular line which occurs in the descent of a falling body, owing to the rotation of the earth on its axis.

(3) Limit of deviation (Engineering):

(a) Deviations in line:

(i) In towns, ten yards each side of the center line.

(ii) In country, one hundred yards, or nearly five chains.

(iii) Curves upward of half a mile radius may be sharpened to half-mile radius; curves of less than half-mile radius must not be sharpened.

(b) Deviations in level: In towns, two feet; in the country, five feet.

(c) Deviations of gradient:

(i) Gradients flatter than 1 in 100, deviation ten feet per mile steeper.

(ii) Gradients steeper than 1 in 100, deviation three feet per mile steeper.

dē-vi-ā-tōr, s. [Eng. deviat(e); -or.] One who deviates (lit. & fig.). (Henry.)

dē-vi-çe, *dē-vis, *dē-vys, *dē-vyse, s. [Fr. devis, devise; Ital. divisa; Sp. devisa; Low Lat. divisa=a division, a bound, a mark, a device, fem. sing. of divisus, pa. par. of divido=to divide.] [DEVISE, DIVIDE.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A plan, a contrivance, a stratagem, a design.

"This is our device,
That Falstaff at that oak shall meet with us."
Shakespeare: Merry Wives, iv. 4.

*2. The act of plotting or scheming; devising.
"... their device against me all the day."—Lamentations, iii. 62.

3. A plot, a trick, a scheme; craft.

"He disappointeth the devices of the crafty."—Job v. 12.

4. Skill or faculty of devising; inventive genius.

"Adorned all with gemmes of endless price
As could be framed by workmans rare device."
Spenser: F. Q., v. ix. 27.

*5. A suggestion, a plan, an idea, a purpose.

"We wolde rewled be at his devys."
Chaucer: C. T., 818.

*6. An opinion.

"Certes, as at my devys
Ther is no place in Paradys
So good inne for to dwell."
Romaine of the Rose, 651.

*7. Any piece of work made or conceived with art, skill, and fancy; a design, an emblem, a conceit.

"Lo, this device was sent me by a nun."
Shakespeare: Lover's Complaint, 232.

8. In the same sense as II.

"A seal bearing exactly the same device and the same superscription."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

*9. The motto attached to or fitted for an emblem.

"A banner with the strange device, Excelsior!"
Longfellow: Excelsior.

*10. A masque.

"That is an old device."
Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, v. 1.

*11. The fashion, design, style, or workmanship of anything.

"Plate of rare device."—Shakespeare: Cymbeline, i. 6.

*12. Manner of thinking, cast, or disposition of mind.

"He's gentle, never schooled, and yet learned, full of noble device."—Shakespeare: As You Like It, i. 1.

II. Her., &c.: An emblem, intended to represent a family, person, action, or quality, with a suitable motto.

† Crabb thus discriminates between device and contrivance: "There is an exercise of art displayed in both these actions; but the former has most of ingenuity, trick, or cunning; the latter more of deduction and plain judgment in it. A device always consists of some invention or something newly made; a contrivance mostly respects the mode, arrangement, or disposition of things. Artists are employed in conceiving devices; men in general use contrivances for the ordinary concerns. A device is often employed for bad and fraudulent purposes; contrivances mostly serve for innocent purposes of domestic life. Beggars have various devices for giving themselves the appearance of wretchedness and exciting the compassion of the spectator; those who are reduced to the necessity of supplying their wants commonly succeed by forming contrivances of which they had not before any conception. Devices are the work of the human understanding only; contrivances are likewise formed by [the lower] animals. Men employ devices with an intention either to deceive or to please others; [the lower] animals have their contrivances either to supply some want or to remove some evil." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

A. As substantive:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: In the same sense as II. 1.

2. Figuratively:

(1) An exceedingly wicked person; a demon, a fiend.

"Could the world pick out three such enemies again, as that fiend Douglas, that spirit Percy, and that devil Glen-dower?"—Shakespeare: Henry IV., Pt. I., ii. 4.

(2) Any great evil or calamity.

"A war of profit mitigates the evil;
But to be tax'd and beaten, is the devil." Granville.

(3) Used as an expletive to express wonder or vexation.

"What a devil hast thou to do with the time of the day?"—Shakespeare: Henry IV., Pt. I., i. 2.

"Here's your niece."

"My niece! the devil she is!"—Love will find out the way, iv.

(4) Used as a kind of ludicrous negative.

"The devil a puritan that he is . . . but a time-passer."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, ii. 3.

(5) A mischievous person.

(6) Used as an expression of mingled pity and contempt; as, a poor devil.

(7) (See extract.) [II. 8.]

"For this purpose a number of men were employed there, on Saturday night, and a large grate, called a devil, filled with burning coals, was used as a light."—London Morning Chronicle.

II. Technically:

1. Script. & Theol.: An evil spirit, whose special employment, as the etymology of the name shows, is to stand forth as an accuser or slanderer [see etym.], the brethren, i. e., Christians, being the special object of his calumnies (Rev. xii. 10). He is identified with the Satan who figures in the later Old Testament composition (1 Chron. xxi. 1; Job i. 6-12; Psalm cix. 6; Zech. iii. 1, 2), and throughout the New (Mat. iv. xii. 26; Luke x. 18; Acts v. 3; 1 Cor. v. 5, &c.). His procedure in accusing and slandering the patriarch Job was exactly that which the New Testament name devil would have led one to expect (Job i. 6-12; i. 1-8). The name Satan (Aram. Shatana) is generally held to mean not accuser, calumniator, but adversary, enemy; there is, however, a cognate one (Heb. satnah), which is rendered, by Gesenius' accusation, so that the signification of Devil and Satan is very closely akin. His character is malignant to the last degree; for he is represented as tempting our Lord (Mat. iv. 1, 5, 8, 11; Luke iv. 2, 3, 5, 13), as sowing tares among wheat (Mat. xiii. 39), as entering Judas Iscariot immediately before the unworthy disciple betrayed his Master (John xiii. 2), as practicing wiles (Ephes. vi. 11), and laying snares (1 Tim. iii. 7). His ability for mischief is great; thus he is described as having the power of death (Heb. ii. 14), but he is not omnipotent, and if resisted will be put to flight (James iv. 7). He is the leader of (wicked) angels, and for him and them everlasting fire is prepared (Mat. xxv. 41). Into that lake of fire the devil will ultimately be cast (Rev. xx. 10). As an infernal hierarchy is thus recognized, a question may arise as to whether the numerous names applied to devils in Scripture, such as the "Prince of the power of the air" (Ephes. ii. 2), Abaddon, Apollyon, &c. (Rev. ix. 11), are all meant for the same malignant being, or whether some of them may not refer to his more prominent followers. Beelzebub and Satan are, however, identical (Mat. xii. 24-26). According to the Talmudists Satan, whose real name is Sammael, or Eblis, was originally an angel with six wings. He is also known as the old serpent, the devil, Beelzebub, the unclean spirit, Leviathan, and Asael. In the East Indian story of the fall he is referred to both as Asur and Mahisasura, and is also represented as the great serpent Vrita, against which Indria fought, and which, after a desperate struggle, he overcame. In the Persian tradition he is known as Ahriman, and it is believed that at the time of the last day, after he has been purified by fire, he will return to obedience and again occupy the realms of the just as an angel.

In Norse mythology the evil spirit is Loki, and it was believed that the wolf and the serpent were his vile progeny. The Egyptians believed that he was a full brother of Osiris, their god, and that he rebelled and was thrown out under the name of Typhon. The people of Tyre and Rhodes spoke of the evil one as Ophion, or the serpent, which will account for the fact that all serpents are to this day classed under the generic name of "Ophidia." Gould says: "Chronos Titan is the same as the Arabic Scheitan, the Erse Teitin, the time god; the Biblical Satan or Lucifer, the Son of the Morning." The Greek story of Prometheus stealing fire from heaven is believed by many learned commentators to be identical with our fall of the devil.

The Caroline Island Indians have a similar myth—that Merogog (the devil) was driven out of heaven, and that he took with him a spark of fire, which he presented to man. Pluto and Plutus, of the Roman and Grecian mythologists, is the same as our devil. In the Irish language he is called Diabhall (god of the air); in Welsh he is called Diawl, meaning "not light," or the god of darkness; in old Saxon he was Duvel, in Danish Diavel, and in the Tartarian language Drof. The gypsies called him Bong, and by the strange system of contraries by which their language, or dialect, is noted, they call God Devil, or Deval, as some writers give it.

The Scripture does not represent the devil and his angels as having been created at first in the low moral state in which they exist. They were originally happy spirits, who when in heaven lapsed into sin (Jude, 6), that of Satan being pride (1 Tim. iii. 6), in consequence of which they were expelled from that blissful abode. The battle in which Michael was the leader of the angelic hosts who remained true in their allegiance to God, has been supposed to be the one in which Satan was expelled from heaven; but it may have another reference (Rev. xii. 7-12). The devil figured largely in the theology of the middle ages, his name inspiring great terror. Nominally he holds exactly the same place in the Christian system still, but he is to a considerable extent ignored in the preaching of the present day. [DEMON, SATAN.]

2. Printing: A printer's errand-boy.

"The loaded press beneath her labor groans,
And printers' devils shake their weary bones."
Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.

3. Weaving, &c.:

(1) A machine for opening out the tussocks of cotton, and cleaning therefrom the dirt and offal. It has various other names, such as willower, willy, beating-machine, &c. [COTTON-CLEANING MACHINE.]

(2) A rag-engine or spiked mill for tearing woolen rags into shoddy, or linen and cotton rags to make paper pulp.

4. Mach.: A machine for making wood screws.

5. Ichthy.: [SEA-DEVIL.]

6. Zool.: The Tasmanian name for Dasyurus ursinus, a carnivorous marsupial quadruped about eighteen inches long, but which is capable of destroying sheep.

7. Cookery: A dish, as a bone with some meat on it, grilled with cayenne pepper.

8. Plumbing: A three-legged grate, full of burning coals, carried by plumbers to the tops of houses or other buildings to melt solder, lead, &c. The name devil is applied from the havoc which it sometimes makes with the building if a live coal dropping from it finds its way among the woodwork of the roof.

"A little charcoal stove, shaped like an iron bottle with a hole in the side, is sometimes used by zinc-workers for heating their irons. It is not, however, so dangerous as the three-legged apparatus, nor is it called by plumbers a devil."

9. Horol.: A small lump of coarse matted wire, with a short handle, used to support articles to be treated with the blowpipe.

10. Pyrot.: A kind of small cracker or firework.

*B. As adj.: Devilish, fiendish, demoniacal; diabolical, damnable.

"That devil monk,
Hopkins, that made this mischief," Shakespeare: Henry VIII., ii. 1.

† In phrases and proverbs:

(1) To go to the devil: To go to ruin.

(2) To play the devil with: To do great harm or injury to, to ruin.

"One that will play the devil, sir, with you."
Shakespeare: King John, ii. 1.

(3) To give the devil his due: To allow even the worst man credit for any good qualities he may have.

*†(4) A twenty devils' way: In the name of twenty devils.

*†(5) The devil rides on a fiddle-stick: A proverbial expression, apparently meant to indicate anything new, unexpected, and strange.

"Heigh, heigh! the devil rides upon a fiddlestick; what's the matter?"—Shakespeare: Henry IV., Pt. I., ii. 4.

(6) When the devil is blind: Never.

(7) Dare-devil: Reckless, heedless, foolhardy; used adjectively or as a substantive.

(8) The devil to pay: A reckoning to be had, as for some mischief or damage done.

(9) Blue devils: Low spirits; same as the blues.

† Crabb thus discriminates between devil and demon: "Since the devil is represented as the father of all wickedness, associations have been connected with the name that render its pronunciation in familiar discourse offensive to the chastened ear; while demon is a term of indifferent application, that is commonly substituted in its stead to designate either a good or an evil spirit. Malice and fraud are the peculiar characteristics of the devil; rage is properly that of a demon. The devil is said in proverbial discourse to be in such things as go contrary to the wish; the demon of jealousy is said to possess the mind; that is altogether carried away with that passion." (Crabb: English Synon.) devil-bird, s.

Ornith.: A name sometimes applied to the members of the genus Dicurus; they are natives of India.

devil-carriage, s. A carriage used for moving heavy ordnance; a sling-cart.

devil's-claws, s.

1. Botany:
(1) Ranunculus arvensis.
(2) Lotus corniculatus.
2. Mach.: A grapnel.

devil's coach-horse, s.

Entom.: The popular name of a species of beetle, Ocyptus olens. It is about an inch long, of a dull black color, and when it meets anything which excites its anger, it throws up its head, opens its sickle-like jaws to their fullest extent, and waves its evil-smelling tail over its back, like that of a scorpion. The odor is peculiarly fetid and enduring. It is very pugnacious and extremely common. Its nature is predacious, and it runs with great speed, whence its name.

devil's coach-wheel, s.

Bot.: Ranunculus arvensis. (Britten & Holland.)

devil's-corn, s.

Bot.: Stellaria holostea. (Britten & Holland.)

devil's-cow, s.

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Devon, or Devonshire, a county in the southwest of England.

B. As subst.: The Devonian rocks (q. v.).

Devonian period.

Geol.: The time during which the Devonian rocks were being deposited. [DEVONIAN ROCKS.]

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fāl; trȳ, sȳrian. s, o = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

Devonian rocks, or system.

Geol.: One of the great divisions of the Palæozoic strata. It is intermediate in age between the Silurian, which is older than it, and the Carboniferous, which is newer. In the early days of geological inquiry, two red sandstones were recognized, one called the Old Red and the other the New Red Sandstone.

The fossils of the lacustrine Old Red Sandstone are chiefly fishes, generally classed as Ganoids, though Prof. Huxley approximates them to the Siluride; those of the marine Devonians are corals such as Favosites and Cyathophyllum with Brachiopod shells and other organisms. Rocks of the age now mentioned occur abroad in Russia, Belgium, France, Great Britain, &c., with some fossils analogous to and others identical with those found at home.

děv-ôn-ite, s. [From being first discovered at Barnstaple, Devon, England.]
Min.: The same as WAVELLITE (q. v.).

Děv-ông, s. pl. [From the county where they are reared. (See def.)] The name given to a breed of cattle which were first bred in Devonshire, England. They are rather wild, of a dark-red color, and can be used instead of horses for plowing. They are smaller than Shorthorns or Herefords. The bull has a small head, fine muzzle and face, very handsome horns, which should taper upward and rather backward; the eye is large and rather wild, indicating an active disposition; the neck is arched, but the dewlap is not much developed; tail set on rather high; good barrel well up behind the shoulder; not the depth of carcass in the same height as is found in the Shorthorns; skin of a dark-red and rather of a mottled character, and plenty of long curling hair; the skin is thicker than that of Shorthorns, but not so thick as that of Herefords. They form a good deal of inside fat and firm meat. The cows yield a very rich milk. They are hardy, and able to find food on poor uplands.

děv-ôr-â-tion, s. [Lat. devoratio, from devoro = to devour.] The act of devouring; the state of being devouring.

"They have been occasions of the death and devouration of manie children."—Holinshed: Descript. Eng., ch. x.

děv-ôr-le, s. [Fr. devoir.] A duty payable from land, or belonging to one in virtue of his office.

děv-ôt-a-ry, s. [Low Latin devotarius, from Lat. devotus, pa. par. of devooveo = to vow, to devote.] A votary.

"There went up a more famous and frequent pilgrimage of devotaries than to any holy land of theirs whatsoever."—Gregory: Works (1684), p. 60.

dě-vô-te, v. t. [Lat. devotus, pa. par. of devooveo: de=fully, and voveo=to vow; Fr. dévouer.]

I. Literally:

1. To consecrate; to dedicate; to set apart or appropriate by vow.

"No devoted thing that a man shall devote unto the Lord . . . shall be sold or redeemed."—Lev. xvii. 21.

2. To offer up; to give as an offering to the gods.

"Decius, following the example of his father at the battle of Vesperis, devoted himself for the Romans."—Lewis: Cred. Early Rom. Hist. (1855), ch. xiii., pt. ii., § 38.

*3. To execrate, to curse, to doom to destruction.

"Let her, like me, of every joy forlorn, Devote the hour when such a wretch was born."
Rowe: Jane Shore, iv. 2.

II. Figuratively:

1. To addict; to give wholly up to.

"The ardor and perseverance with which he devoted himself to his mission have scarcely any parallel in history."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vii.

2. To give up, to resign, to abandon.

"Alike devote to sorrow's dire extreme
The day reflection and the midnight dream."
Pope: Homer's Odyssey, iv. 1,061, 1,062.

3. To doom, to consign.

"Aliens were devoted to their rapine and despoilment."—More: Decay of Piety.

II. Meteorol.: Moisture condensed from the atmosphere upon the surface of certain bodies. Dew must have attracted the attention of mankind from the earliest ages. In modern times Pictet of Geneva, Le Roy of Montpellier, Six of Canterbury, and Patrick Wilson of Glasgow, have investigated the subject—especially the last-named man of science, who wrote, in A. D. 1780, valuable observations on this part of meteorology; but the standard work on the subject is The Theory of Dew, published in A. D. 1814, by Dr. Charles William Wells, F.R.S., of London (formerly of the United States). The higher the temperature the more aqueous vapor can the atmosphere retain in solution. The diminution, therefore, of heat, which takes place when day is succeeded by night, in many cases renders the air incapable of retaining some of the moisture which it held in the form of vapor during the day. This is deposited on any bodies which at the time are colder than the adjacent atmosphere. It scarcely ever happens that the air is saturated with vapor, or, as it is more correctly worded, that the aqueous vapor is in the condition of greatest possible density for the temperature. As Aristotle long ago observed, dew is deposited chiefly on calm and serene nights. It is more plentiful in spring and autumn than in summer. A cloudy night interferes with the condensation, for the clouds intercept radiation from the earth, and, in many cases, prevent the temperature falling to the dew-point. [DEW-POINT.] Dew when congealed becomes hoarfrost.

B. As adj.: In any way pertaining to dew; moist, damp.

dew-point, s.

Meteorol.: The temperature of the glass in a hygrometer at the moment when dew begins to form upon its surface. It corresponds with the point of saturation in the air. When the air outside a house has cooled down by radiation to this point, dew is deposited and latent heat given out. Thus the dew-point determines the minimum temperature of the night, and to ascertain it is of importance to the horticulturist, as it enables him, in certain cases, to predict frost and take timely precautions against its probable effects. (Buchanan.)

dew-rake, s. A fine rake, used on lawns.

"Make leeches and their punks with dewtry Commit phantastical aduotry."

Butler: Hudibras, III. i. 319, 320.

dew-ŷ (ew as ū), deaw-le, a. [Eng. dew; -y.] I. Ordinary Language:

1. Full of or accompanied with dew.

"But from the earth a dewy mist Went up, and watered all the ground."

Milton: P. L., vii. 333, 334.

2. Resembling dew.

"I would these dewy tears were from the ground."

Shakesp.: Richard III., v. 3.

3. Covered with dew; roscid.

"The herds and flocks are yet abroad to crop

The dewy grass." Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. v.

4. Falling gently like dew; refreshing.

"Immersed in dewy sleep ambrosial."

Cooper: Homer's Iliad, bk. ii.

II. Bot.: Having the appearance of being covered with dew; roscid.

dewy-feathered, a. Falling gently as dew.

"And the waters murmuring,

With such consort as they keep Entice the dewy-feathered sleep."

Milton: Il Penseroso, 144-46.

dewy-skirted, a. Skirted or accompanied by dew.

"The dewy-skirted clouds imbibe the sun."

Thomson: Autumn, 960.

dēx-a-mine, s. [Gr. dexamēnē=a receptacle, a reservoir.]

Zoöl.: A small genus of Crustaceans, family Gammaridae, order Amphipoda; established by Leach. Dexamine spinosus is very common on the southern coasts of England, and is often taken in the shore net or found beneath stones among the rocks at low tide. In general appearance the Dexamine are not unlike their allies the Sand-hoppers or Sand-fleas. The antennae are long, slender, and three-jointed; there are fourteen legs, the first and second pairs being monodactyle, with a small compressed hand, the other pairs are furnished with simple claws; the body, including the head, has twelve joints.

dēx-l-a-s, s. [Gr. dexia=the right hand.]

Entom.: A genus of Dipterous insects, the type of the family Dexariæ.

dēx-l-ār-l-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. dexi(a), and Lat. adj. pl. fem. suff. -aria.]

Entom.: A family of Dipterous insects, which subsist chiefly on the juices of flowers.

dēx-tēr, a. & adv. [Lat.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) Pertaining to or situated on the right-hand side.

"My mother's blood

Runs on the dexter cheek, and this sinister

Bounds in my father's." Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, iv. 5.

(2) Appearing on the right-hand side.

"As thus he spoke, behold, in open view,

On sounding wings a dexter eagle flew."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, xiii. 1,088, 1,089.

2. Fig.: Favorable, auspicious, propitious.

"Prosperous he sailed with dexter auguries,

And all the winged good omens of the skies."

Pope: Homer's Odyssey, xxiv. 362, 363.

II. Her.: The right; situated on the right; as the dexter side of a shield is that opposite the left hand of the spectator.

"How comes it that the victorious arms of England . . . are not placed on the dexter side?"—Brewer: Lingua, iii. 6.

B. As adv.: On or toward the right-hand side.

"In solemn speed the bird majestic flew Full dexter to the car."

Pope: Homer's Odyssey, xv. 183, 184.

† Dexter chief point:

Her.: A point in the right-hand upper corner of a shield.

dēx-tēr-l-cal, a. [Eng. dexter; -ical.] Dexterous.

"Divine Plato affirms, that those have most dexteritæ wits, who are wont to be stir'd up with a heavenly fury."—Optic Glasse of Humors (1639). (Nares.)

dēx-tēr-l-tŷ, dex-ter-i-tee, s. [Fr. dexterité; Lat. dexteritas, from dexter=the right; Gr. dexteros=the right, as opposed to the left.]

1. The ability to use the right hand better or more expertly than the left; right-handedness.

"Dexterity appears to be confined to the human race. For the monkey tribes use the right and left limbs indiscriminately."—Lancet. (Ogilvie.)

2. Bodily or physical activity, expertness, adroitness, or skill; readiness or suppleness of limbs; the skill or expertness gained by practice or experience.

"The fiery youth who was to be

The heir of his dexterity."

Longfellow: The Building of the Ship.

3. Mental quickness or readiness; promptness in contriving or inventing means to attain an object or accomplish a purpose; skill in the management of an affair; tact, cleverness.

"Dundee was contending with difficulties which all his energy and dexterity could not completely overcome."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

† Crabb thus discriminates between dexterity, address, and ability: "Dexterity respects the manner of executing things; it is the mechanical facility of performing an office; address refers to the use of means in executing; ability to the discernment of the things themselves. Dexterity and address are but in fact modes of ability: the former may be acquired; the latter is the gift of nature: we may have ability to any degree, but dexterity and address are positive degrees of ability. To form a good government there must be ability in the prince or his ministers; address in those to whom the detail of operations is intrusted; and dexterity in those to whom the execution of orders is intrusted. With little ability and long habit in transacting business we may acquire a dexterity in despatching it, an address in giving it whatever turn will best suit our purpose. Dexterity lends an air of ease to every action; address supplies art and ingenuity in contrivance; ability enables us to act with intelligence and confidence." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dēx-tēr-ōūs, dēx-troūs, a. [Eng. dexter; -ous.]

1. Using the right hand in preference to the left; right-handed.

2. Expert or skilled in any manual employment; active, skillful, clever in the use of the limbs.

"Alden . . . was watching her dexterous fingers."

Longfellow: Courtship of Miles Standish, viii.

3. Quick and ready mentally; prompt in contriving or inventing means for the attainment of an object or accomplishment of a purpose.

"The most cautious, dexterous, and taciturn of men."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

4. Done or managed with dexterity or address; skillful, able.

" . . . were induced by dexterous management to abate much of their demands."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

† For the difference between dexterous and clever, see CLEVER.

dēx-tēr-ōūs-lŷ, dēx-troūs-lŷ, adv. [English dexterous; -ly.] In a dexterous, skillful, or expert manner; with dexterity, skill, or expertness.

"He had employed a messenger who had very dexterously managed to be caught."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

dēx-tēr-ōūs-nēss, dēx-troūs-nēss, s. [Eng. dexterous; -ness.]

1. Dexterity in manual employment.

"Besides the dexterousness and propensity of the child being descended lineally from so many of the same trade."—Howell: Letters, iii. 8.

2. Mental readiness or quickness.

"He hath no way to extricate himself but by the dexterousness of his ingenuity."—Feltham: Resolves, ii. 60.

dēx-trād, a. [Eng. dexter; -ad.]

Med.: Toward the dextral aspect, as of the body; toward the right of the mesial plane.

"Any tunics or skins which should hinder the liver from enabling the dextral parts . . ."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. iv., ch. v.

dextral shell, s.

Conchol.: A spiral shell, whose whorls, when the mouth is placed toward the observer, turn from left to right. This is the general course in nature. Sinistral or reversed shells are those whose spires turn from right to left. In other words, when spiral shells are placed vertically with the spires uppermost, and the mouth toward the observer, the aperture in dextral shells is toward the right, and in sinistral toward the left.

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōw; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist, ph = f.

dēx-trāl'-ī-tŷ, s. [Eng. dextral; -ily.]

1. The state or condition of being situated on the right side, not on the left.

"If there were a determinate prepotency in the right, and such as arise from a constant root in nature, we might expect the same in other animals, whose parts are also differentiated by dextrality."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. iv., ch. v.

2. Right-handedness.

"Did not institution but nature determine dextrality."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. iv., ch. v.

dēx-trin, dēx-trine, s. [Lat. dexter, and Eng. suff. -ine (Chem.) (q. v.).]

Chem.: $C_6H_{10}O_5$. Starch gum, British gum. Obtained by the action of boiling dilute sulphuric acid on starch, and afterward neutralizing with chalk; if boiled for a longer time the dextrin is converted into dextrose (q. v.). Dextrin can also be formed by heating starch to between 170° to 200° C. It is a gummy amorphous mass, soluble in water, and precipitated by alcohol. It is called dextrin on account of its dextro-rotatory action on polarized light. Dextrin is formed in germinating seeds by the action of an azotized substance called Diastase (q. v.). Dextrin is used as a substitute for gum. [GUM, STARCH.]

dextrin sugar, s. An uncrystallizable dextro-rotatory sugar, probably a mixture of dextrin and glucose.

dēx-trō-, in compos. [Lat. dexter=the right.]

Chem.: Used in composition to signify the turning of the plane of a ray of polarized light to the right.

Chemistry: Any compound body which has the property of causing the plane of a ray of polarized light to rotate to the right. Such are dextrine, dextro-glucose, tartaric acid, malic acid, &c.

dextro-glucose, s. [DEXTROSE.]

dextro-gyrate, a. Causing to turn toward the right hand.

"If the analyzer [a piece of quartz] has to be turned toward the right, so as to cause the colors to succeed each other in their natural order . . . the piece of quartz is called right-handed or dextro-gyrate."—Rodwell.

dextro-racemic, a. Used only in the subjoined compound.

[Dextro-racemic acid:]

Chem.: A name given to ordinary tartaric acid to distinguish it from lævo-racemic, lævo-tartaric, or anti-tartaric acid.

dextro-rotatory, dextro-rotary, a. Causing to rotate to the right.

"It [dextrine] is named from its powerfully dextro-rotatory action on light."—Williamson: Chemistry, § 314.

Chem.: The same as Dextro-racemic acid.

dēx-trō-gyre (yre as ir), s. [Lat. dexter, -tera, -terum, or more commonly -tra, -trum=to the right, on the right, and gyrus; Gr. gyros=a circle.]

Polarized Light: Polarization to the right.

dēx-trōn-āte, s. [Eng. dextron(ic), and suff. -ate (Chem.) (q. v.).]

Chem.: A salt of dextronic acid.

dēx-trōn-īc, a. [Lat. dextro (in compos.)=to the right; n euphonic; Eng. adj. suff. -ic.]

dextronic acid, s.

Chem.: $C_6H_{12}O_7$. Obtained by acting on dextrine or starch with bromine-water at 100° C., and then treating it with silver oxide. It is a sour, uncrystallizable syrup. It forms crystalline salts, which are less soluble than those of the isomeric gluconic acid; by long boiling dextrones are converted into gluconates. Dextronic acid is monobasic.

Chem.: Grape sugar, dextro-glucose, $C_6H_{12}O_6$ or $C_6H_8O(OH)_5$. Dextrose occurs along with levulose in grapes and other sweet fruits, also in honey, and in the urine of diabetic patients. It can be produced by the action of dilute sulphuric acid on cane sugar, starch, cellulose, &c. It can be best obtained by boiling for several hours fifty parts of starch with dilute sulphuric acid (100 parts of water to five parts of H_2SO_4). The solution is then neutralized with chalk, filtered, boiled with animal charcoal to remove traces of color, and then evaporated carefully to dryness, forming an amorphous mass, which contains about sixty per cent. of dextrose, the remainder being chiefly dextrin. Pure dextrose can be obtained by crystallization from alcohol; it contains then one molecule of water of crystallization, and forms microscopic rhombic crystals, which soften at 60°, melt at 86°, and lose their water of crystallization at 110°. Heated to 170° it is converted into glucosan ($C_6H_{10}O_6$). Dextrose crystallizes out of absolute alcohol in anhydrous fine prisms, which melt at 146°. It turns polarized light to the right, and dissolves lime, baryta, oxide of lead, &c. Dextrose reduces an alkaline solution of cupric sulphate, giving a red precipitate of Cu_2O on heating. It reduces ferric salts to ferrous salts. On heating it with a solution of sodium carbonate and basic bismuthic nitrate the liquid becomes dark, and a gray-brown precipitate is formed. On boiling it with an alkaline solution of mercuric cyanide, metallic mercury is precipitated. An aqueous solution readily ferments when mixed with yeast and exposed to a temperature of 21° to 26° C., yielding alcohol; $C_6H_{12}O=2C_2H_5(OH)+2CO_2$, glycerine and succinic acid are also formed in small quantities. [FERMENTATION.] Dextrose tastes much less sweet than ordinary cane sugar. Heated with acetic anhydride, it forms diacetyl and triacetyl compounds as $C_6H_7O_3(OH)_2(O^C_2H_3O)_3$. By the action of sodium amalgam on dextrose, it is converted into mannite, $C_6H_{14}O_6$. A solution of dextrose becomes brown when boiled with caustic alkalies. [SUGAR.]

dēy (ey as ā) (1), s. [Turk. dai=(1) an uncle, (2) one of mature age, (3) a commander.] The title of the old sovereigns of Algiers and Tripoli, under the protectorate of Turkey, and of Tunis under that of France.

dēy (2), dēye, s. [Icel. deigja=a dairy-maid; Sw. deja=literally a dougher, a maker of bread, from Icel. deig; Sw. deg=dough.] [DAIRY.]

1. A maid; especially a dairy-maid.

"Sche was as it were a maner dēye."

Chaucer: C. T., 15,332.

2. A man-servant, a herd.

dēy'-mūt-tin, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Chem.: A substance said to occur in the roots and stalks of Cissampelos Pareira. (Watts: Dict. Chem.)

D. F. An abbreviation for defensor fidei=defender of the faith.

D. G. An abbreviation for Dei gratia=by the grace of God.

dhāk, s. [A native word.]

Bot.: Butea frondosa, a tree belonging to the order Leguminosæ. It is a native of the East Indies. It yields a resinous matter, and the flowers discharge a beautiful yellow or orange dye.

[The more common Indian name of Butea frondosa is, however, Palas, Pulus, or Pullus. [BUTEA.]

dhāl, s. [A native word.]

Bot.: A kind of vetch, a native of the East Indies.

dhôle, s. [Cingalese.]

Zool.: The wild dog of India, Canis dukhunensis. It is of a brown or deep bay color, and in size between a wolf and a jackal. It hunts in packs.

dhō-nēy, s. [A native word.] A native coasting-vessel of India with two masts, and not exceeding 150 tons.

dhō-tēe, dhōo-tŷ, dhō-tŷ, s. [Hind. dhotee; Mahr. dhotur.] A long, narrow strip of cotton or gauze worn by male Hindus as pantaloons. It is called also loong, or lunggote.

dhōw, s. [Arab.] An Arab vessel with a single mast, a yard the length of the vessel, and a lateen sail. Dhows are from 150 to 200 tons burden.

dhū, dūbh (bh as v), a. [Gael.] Black.

di- (1), pref. [Gr. for dis=twice; Lat. bis; Sansc. dis, dvī.] A common prefix expressing twice, double, or twofold; as, di-branchiate=having two gills. In Chemistry di- prefixed to a word denotes that it contains two atoms, or two radicals of the substance to which the di is prefixed; thus di-chloroacetic acid, $CHCl_2.CO.OH$, contains two atoms of chlorine; di-phenyl ketone, $C_6H_5.CO.C_6H_5$, contains the radical phenyl, C_6H_5 , twice. [BI.] di- (2), diff. dis-, pref. [Lat. dis=apart.] A common prefix used to signify division, separation, or distribution. Dif is used before words beginning with f.

di-a-, pref. [Gr. dia=through, between, apart.] A prefix in words derived from the Greek, and used to express—by, through, division, or diversity.

di-a-bāse, s. [Pref. di=twice, and Eng. base (q. v.).]

Mineralogy: A fine-grained, compact, crystalline-granular rock, tough and heavy.

diabase aphanite, s. A very fine-grained or compact variety of quartz-diabase, in which the constituents are not to be recognized without the aid of the lens or the microscope. (Rutley: On Rocks, p. 247.)

diabase-porphry, s.

Min.: The dark-green antique porphyry, containing hornblende in its compact, diabase-like mass. Specific gravity, 2.9-3.0.

diabase-schist, s. An aphanitic rock with a schistose structure. (Rutley: On Rocks, p. 247.)

di-a-bā-tēr'-ī-āl, a. [Gr. diabatēria; sc. hiera=offerings presented before crossing a river, border, &c.; diabainō=to cross; dia=through, and bainō=to go.] Passing across or beyond the borders of a place.

di-a-bē-tēs, s. [Gr. diabainō=to go or pass through.]

Med.: A constitutional disease produced by mal-assimilation in the stomach, liver, kidneys, or in the blood, specially marked by a very excessive discharge of urine, which is always saccharine, excessive thirst, and great bodily emaciation. Dr. Thomas Willis, in the time of Charles II., first observed the constant presence of sugar in the urine. The quantity of urine passed may vary from ten to thirty or more pints in the day, with intense thirst, the patient often drinking many quarts, or even gallons daily. The density of the urine is usually increased, and from 400 to 900 grs. of sugar will be passed in each pint of urine, so that in a single day from one to two, or even two and a half pounds of sugar will be passed in the twenty-four hours, and in a few months patients will pass their own weight in sugar. The drain on the constitution is very great, even the teeth sometimes falling out; and although life may be prolonged, yet the disease is very intractable.

"An increase of that secretion may accompany the general colliquations; as in fluxes, hectic sweats, and coughs, diabetes, and other consumptions."—Derham: Physico-Theology.

di-a-bēt'-ic, a. [Eng. diabet(es); -ic.] Of or pertaining to diabetes.

diabetic sugar, s. [DXTROSE.]

di-a-bēt'-ic-āl, a. [Eng. diabetic; -al.] Of or pertaining to diabetes.

di-a'-ble, s. [Fr., from Lat. diabolus.] [DEVIL.] The devil.

"Diable! Jack Rugby, mine host de Jarteer,—have I not stay for him to kill him?"—Shakspeare: Merry Wives, iii. 1.

di-a'-blēr-le, *di-a'-blēr-ŷ, s. [Fr. diablerie.]

1. Mischief, wickedness, devilry.

2. Dealings with the devil; diabolic agency.

di-a'-blō, s. [Sp. diablo, from Lat. diabolus.]

[DEVIL.] The devil.

"Who's that that rings the bell? Diablo, oh!" Shakspeare: Othello, ii. 3.

di-ab'-ōl-arch, s. [Gr. diabolos=the devil, and archō=to rule.] A prince or ruler of devils.

"There will be no need to expound it of the diabol-arch."—J. Ozley: Confut. of the Diabolarchy, p. 9.

di-ab'-ōl-arch-ŷ, s. [DIABOLARCH.] The rule of the devil.

"The received dogma of the diabolarchy."—J. Ozley: Confut. of the Diabolarchy, p. 30.

di-a-bōl'-ic, *di-a-bōl'-ick, di-a-bōl'-ī-cal, a. [Fr. diabolique; Sp., Port., & Ital. diabolico; Lat. diabolicus; Gr. diabolikos=devilish; diabolos=the devil (q. v.).]

1. Of or pertaining to the devil; devilish.

"... diabolic power Active within, beyond the sense of brute." Milton: P. L., ix. 96, 96.

2. Infernal, devilish, damnable, outrageous.

di-a-bōl'-ī-cāl-ī-tŷ, s. [Eng. diabolical; -ity.]

Diabolicalness, damnableness.

di-a-bōl'-ī-cal-lŷ, adv. [Eng. diabolical; -ly.]

1. In a diabolical, devilish, or damnable manner or degree.

2. With the devil or by means of devilish mediums.

di-a-bōl'-ī-cal-nēss, s. [Eng. diabolical; -ness.]

The quality of being diabolical; damnableness, devilishness.

"I wonder he did not change his face as well as his body, but that retains its primitive diabolicalness."—Dr. Warton: Satire on Ranelagh House.

di-a-bōl'-ī-fŷ, v. t. [Lat. diabolus; Gr. diabolos=the devil; Lat. facio (pass. fio)=to make.] To rank among devils; to ascribe diabolical qualities to.

"One faction turns them against another; the Lutherans against the Calvinists, and diabolifies him."—Farrington: Serm. (1647), p. 59.

di-ab'-ōl-ish, adv. [Lat. diabol(us)=the devil, and Eng. adj. suff. -ish.] Devilishly, deucedly.

"The Professor said it was a diabolish good word."—Holmes: Autocrat of Breakfast-Table, p. 139.

di-ab'ôl-izm, s. [Lat. diabol(us), and Eng. suff. -ism.]

1. Actions or conduct worthy of or befitting a devil; diabolical actions.

"While thou so hotly disclaimest the devil, be not guilty of diabolism."—Brown: Chr. Mor., i. 16.

2. Possession by the devil.

"He was now projecting the farce of diabolisms and exorcisms."—Warburton: Doct. of Gr., ii. 238.

di-âb'ôl-ize, v. t. [Lat. diabol(us)=the devil, and Eng. suff. -ize.] To render diabolical or devilish.

di-a-brô'sis, s. [Gr. from dia=throughout, fully, and brôsis=an eating; bibrôsko=to eat.]

Surg.: Corrosion; the action of substances which occupy an intermediate position in properties between escharotics and caustics.

di-a-brôt-ic, a. & s. [Gr. diabrôtikos=corrosive.]

As adj.: Corroding; eating off by degrees. (Ash.)

As subst.: A medicine to corrode the part to which it is applied; a corrosive. (Ash.) di-a-câl'pê, s. [Gr. dia=across, and kalpê=a pitcher, an urn.]

Bot.: A genus of Polypodioid Ferns, with globular indusia, splitting open at the top, and containing sporanges inserted in a punctiform receptacle rising from the middle of the vein. They are natives of Java. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

di-a-ca-thôl'i-côn, s. [Gr. dia=through, and katholikos=universal.] [CATHOLIC.]

Med.: The universal purgative; the old name given to an electuary composed of vegetable and carminative substances.

di-a-câus'tic, a. & s. [Gr. dia=through; kautô=burning; kaiô=to burn.]

As adjective:

1. Surg.: Cauterizing by refraction, as when the solar rays are concentrated and made to act on the animal organs by a burning lens.

2. Math.: Applied to a species of caustic curve formed by refraction. [DIACAUSTIC CURVE.]

As substantive:

1. Medicine:

(1) That which cauterizes, or acts as a caustic by refraction, as the solar rays concentrated by a double-convex lens.

(2) A double-convex lens used in cauterizing parts of the body.

2. Math.: A diacaustic curve.

diacaustic curve, s.

Math.: A caustic curve formed by refraction. If A B represent a section of a surface of a refracting Diacaustic Curve.

medium, B the radiant point, n_1, n_2, n_3 , &c., rays of light incident upon the surface, and 1 a, 2 b, 3 c, &c., refracted rays, then the curve A a b c . . . e, which is tangent to all the refracted rays, is a diacaustic curve.

di-a-çet'a-mide, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and Eng. acetamide.]

Chem.: $\text{NH} \cdot (\text{C}_2\text{H}_3\text{O})_2$. A crystalline substance, melting at 59°, and boiling at 210°. It is very soluble in water. Diacetamide is obtained by heating acetamide, $\text{NH}_2 \cdot \text{C}_2\text{H}_3\text{O}$, in a dry stream of hydrochloric acid, $2(\text{NH}_2 \cdot \text{C}_2\text{H}_3\text{O}) + \text{HCl} = \text{NH} \cdot (\text{C}_2\text{H}_3\text{O})_2 + \text{NH}_4\text{Cl}$. This is a general reaction by which primary amides can be converted into secondary amides. Diacetamide can also be obtained by heating to 200° methylcyanide (acetonitril), CH_3CN , with glacial acetic acid.

di-a-çet-ôn'a-mine, s. [Pref. di, Eng. acetone(e), and amine.]

Chemistry: $\text{C}_6\text{H}_{12}\text{NO}$, or $\text{CH}_3 > \text{C}(\text{NH}_2) \cdot \text{CO} \cdot \text{CH}_3$. Obtained by passing dry ammonia gas into gently boiling acetone, $\text{CH}_3 \cdot \text{CO} \cdot \text{CH}_3$, neutralizing the distillate with sulphuric acid, and recrystallizing the sulphate out of boiling alcohol. Diacetoneamine is a colorless liquid slightly soluble in water, which, when distilled, is decomposed into NH_3 and mesityl-oxide, $\text{CH}_3 > \text{C} = \text{CH} \cdot \text{CO} \cdot \text{CH}_3$.

di-a-çet-ôn'-ic, a. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, Eng. acetone(e), and suff. -ic.]

diacetonic alcohol.

Chem.: Obtained by the action of potassium nitrate, KNO_3 , on diacetoneamine. Diacetonic alcohol, $\text{CH}_3 > \text{C}(\text{OH}) \cdot \text{CH}_2 \cdot \text{CO} \cdot \text{CH}_3$. It is a syrupy liquid, boiling at 164°, and mixes with water, alcohol, and ether.

di-a-çhœ-ni-ûm, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and achenium (q. v.).]

Bot.: A cremocarp, a fruit composed of two achenia, as in the Umbelliferae and Galium. [CREMOCARP.]

di-âch'-y-lûm, di-âch'-y-lôn, s. [Gr. diachylos=very juicy; dia (intens.), and chylos=juice.]

1. Lit. & Med.: Formerly a plaster made of the juices of several plants; now a plaster made by boiling hydrated oxide of lead with olive-oil. It is used for curing ulcers.

"Devising stopples made of the common plaister, called diachylum."—Boyle: Works, i. 7.

*2. Fig.: An emollient, a soothing application.

"He thought it better, as better it was, to assuage his bruised dignity with half a yard square of balmy diplomatic diachylon."—Burke: On a Regicide Peace.

di-âch'-y-ma, s. [Gr. dia=through, between, and chyma=an infusion, cheô=to pour.]

Bot.: The parenchyma or cellular tissue of leaves.

di-âc'-la-gite, s. [Greek diaktasis=breakage, cleavage.]

Min.: An orthorhombic, foliated, massive mineral of a brass-yellow to a greenish-gray color; transparent or translucent and brittle. Hardness, 3.5-4; specific gravity, 3.054.

di-a-cle, s. [Etym. unknown.] The compass used in a fishing-boat. (Scotch.)

"Every boat carries one compass at least, provincially a diacle."—Agric. Survey of Shetland, p. 81.

di-a-cô'-di-ûm, s. [Gr. diakodion: dia=through, and kôdeia, kôdia=a poppy-head.]

Phar.: A preparation of poppies. Syrup of diacodium, the former name of syrup of white poppies.

di-âc'-ôn-âl, a. [O. Fr. from Low Lat. diaconalis, from Lat. diaconus=a deacon (q. v.).] Of or pertaining to a deacon.

di-âc'-ôn-âte, s. & a. [Fr. diaconat, from Lat. diaconatus, from diaconus.]

As substantive:

1. The office or dignity of a deacon.

2. The body of deacons collectively.

As adj.*: Managed or superintended by deacons.

"This one great diaconate church."—Goodwin: Works, vol. iv., pt. iv., p. 189.

di-a-côn'-i-cûm, s. [Gr. diakonikon, neut. of diakonikos=pertaining to service; diakonys=a servant, a deacon.]

Arch.: A place contiguous to the ancient churches, wherein were preserved the sacred vestments, vessels, relics, and ornaments of the altar. In modern language, the sacristy (q. v.). (Gwilt.) di-âc'-ô-pê, s. [Gr. diakopê=a cutting in two, a cut; dia=across, and koptô=to cut.]

1. Gram.: Tmesis; the separating of two parts of a word by the interpolation of other words: as, "Of whom be thou ware."

2. Ichthy.: A genus of Acanthopterygian Fishes belonging to the family Percide, or Perches, many species of which inhabit the Indian seas. They are distinguished by a notch in the lower part of the preoperculum, in which a projecting tubercle is fitted.

3. Surg.: A longitudinal fracture or fissure of the cranial bone, or an oblique cut of the cranial integuments.

di-a-côus'tic, a. & s. [Gr. dia=through, and akoustikos=pertaining to hearing; akouô=to hear.]

As adj.: Pertaining to the science or doctrine of refracted sounds.

As subst. (pl.): The science or doctrine of refracted sounds; that branch of science which treats of the properties of refracted sounds. It is also called Diaphonics (q. v.).

di-a-crit'-sis, s. [Gr. dia=between, and krinô=to judge, to decide.] The same as DIAGNOSIS (q. v.).

di-a-crit'-i-cal, di-a-crit'-ic, a. & s. [Gr. diakritikos=fit for judging or deciding, from diakrinô=to distinguish.]

As adj. (of both forms): Used or serving to distinguish or separate; distinguishing, distinctive: as a diacritical mark used to distinguish letters which are similar in form, or the different sounds of a letter.

"From f, in the Icelandic alphabet, v is distinguished only by a diacritical point."—Johnson: Grammar of the English Tongue.

As subst. (of the form diacritic): A diacritical mark or sign.

"In some cases the diacritic becomes incorporated into the letter."—H. Sweet: Hist. of Eng. Sounds, in Trans. Philol. Soc., 1873-4, p. 482.

di-a-dêlph, s. [Gr. pref. di=twice, twofold, and adelphos=a brother.]

Bot.: A plant which has the stamens united into two bodies or bundles by their filaments.

di-a-dêl'-phl-a, s. pl. [Eng. diadelph, and Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ia.]

Bot.: In the Linnean system the seventeenth class of plants, characterized by having the stamens diadelphous.

di-a-dêl'-phl-an, di-a-dêl'-phic, di-a-dêl'-phous, a. [Eng. diadelph; -ian, -ic, -ous.]

Bot.: Having the stamens united into two bundles by their filaments.

The bundles may be equal or unequal, as it frequently happens in Papilionaceous plants that out of ten stamens, nine are united by their filaments, while one (the posterior) is free.

di'-a-dêm, di'-a-deme, dy'-a-deme, s. [Fr. diadème, from Lat. diadema; Gr. diadêma, from diadeô=to bind round; dia=apart, around, and deô=to bind.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. A fillet or band for the head, worn as an emblem of sovereignty. It was made of silk, linen, &c., and tied round the forehead and temples, the ends being left loose. It was first used by the Roman emperors in the person of Constantine the Great, and after his time was set with pearls and precious stones.

2. A crown; a head-ornament worn by royalty.

"Ye scepters, diadems, and rolling trains

Of flat'ring pomp, farewell!"

Smollett: The Regicide.

3. A reward, a prize; a crown of glory or victory.

"Bright is the diadem, boundless the sway,

Or kingly the death, which awaits us to-day."

Byron: Song of Saul.

4. Anything resembling a crown.

"Mount Blanc . . . with a diadem of snow."

Byron: Manfred, i. 1.

5. Supreme power; sovereignty.

"Faction, that once made diadems her prey,

And stopt our prince in his triumphant way,

Fled like a mist before this radiant day."

Roscommon.

II. Her.: An arch rising from the rim of a crown or of a coronet, and uniting with other arches to form a center which, in the case of a crown, serves to support the globe and crossor fleur-de-lis as a crest.

diadem lemur, s. A lemur of the sub-family Indridinae.

(Rosier.)

diadem spider, s. A name sometimes given to the Garden Spider, the Epeira diadema. [GARDEN SPIDER.]

di'-a-dêm, v. t. [DIADÈM, s.] To adorn with a diadem or anything resembling a diadem.

"Arabia's harvest and the Paphian rose

Her lofty front she diadems around."

Cooper: Milton; Latin Poems, Elegy v. (Transl.)

di-a-dê'-ma, s. [Lat. diadema; Gr. diadêma.]

[DIADÈM.]

Zool.: A genus of Echinoids, the typical one of the family Diademadæ (q. v.).

di-a-dêm'-a-dæ, s. pl. [Lat. diadema, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -adæ.]

1. Zool.: A family of Regular Echinoids. The test is circular or pentagonal; the ambulacral areas wide and having two rows of large primary tubercles; the spines cylindrical, slender, and usually of considerable length. Sometimes it is made to include the Hemidariidae.

2. Palæont.: The family commenced at least as early as the Lias.

di'-a-dêm-â-têd, a. [Lat. diadematus.] Wearing a diadem; wearing a crown; wearing a turban. (Ash.) Diadelph.

1. Spray of Common Sweet-pea.
2. Diadelphous Stamens.

Diadem.

bôl, bôy; pôt, jôwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, çhis; sin, ag; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bpl, dpl.

†di-ā-dēmed. di-a-demyd, pa. par. or a. [DIADEM. v.] Adorned with or wearing a diadem.

"Not so, when diademed with rays divine."
Pope: Ep. to Satires, ii. 232.

di-ā-dēs-mūs, s. [Gr. diu=across, and desmos=a bond.]
Zool.: A genus of Diatomaceæ containing eight species, some of which are fossil.

di-ād-ō-chīte, s. [Gr. diadochos=a successor, on the supposition that it is an iron sinter, in which phosphoric acid has replaced the arsenic acid.]
Min.: A reniform or stalactitic mineral of a yellow or yellowish-brown color, found near Gräfen-thal and Saalfeld in Thuringia. (Dana.) di-ā-drōm, s. [Greek diadromos=a running through: diu=through, and dromos=a running; dramein, 2d aor. infin. of trechō=to run.] The time in which any motion is performed; the time in which a pendulum performs its vibration.

"Whose diadroms, in the latitude of forty-five degrees, are each equal to one second of time, or a sixtieth of a minute."—Locke.

di-ē-rē-sis, di-ē-rē-sis, s. [Lat. diceretis; Gr. diareisis is a dividing; diareō=to take apart; diu=apart, and haireō=to take; Fr. dérèse.]

1. Gram.: The resolution or dividing of one syllable into two.

2. Printing: A mark (") placed over the second of two adjacent vowels to indicate that they should be both pronounced; as, ærated; also placed over a syllable not usually pronounced to show that it is to be pronounced; as, belovéd, curséd.

di-ā-glyph-ic, a. [Gr. diaglyphō=to carve all over: diu, intens., and glyphō=to carve.]

Fine Arts: In which applied to sculpture, engraving, &c., in which the subject is sunk into the general ground.

di-āg-nō-se, v. t. & i. [Gr. diagnōsis=a distinguishing between.] [DIAGNOSIS.]

A. Transitive:

1. Ord. Lang.: To distinguish, to discriminate, to determine.

2. Path.: To discriminate or distinguish "the nature of a disease; to ascertain from the symptoms the true nature and seat of a disease.

"It was a case which a qualified medical man ought to be able to diagnose."—London Daily Telegraph.

B. Intransitive:

Path.: To make a diagnosis of a disease.

"Mr. —'s opinion was worthless, as he did not diagnose."—London Daily Telegraph.

di-āg-nō-sis, s. [Gr., from diu=between, and gnōsis=inquiry, knowledge; gignōskō=to know; Fr. diagnose.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A scientific determination or discrimination; a short distinctive description.

"In a score of words Mr. Bain has here sketched my mental diagnosis."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3d ed.), ch. vii., p. 128.

2. Path.: A scientific determination or discrimination of diseases by their symptoms.

"The diagnosis of the case would be apparent to all medical men."—London Daily Telegraph.

3. Bot.: The short character by which one plant is distinguished from another.

di-āg-nōs-tic, di-āg-nōs-tick, a. & s. [Gr. diagnōstikos=able to distinguish, from diagnōsis=knowledge, judgment.]

A. As adj.: That which serves to distinguish; distinctive; characteristic.

"The pathognomonic or diagnostic symptoms."—Dr. Tweedie: Art. Fever in Cycl. of Pract. Med., ii. 161.

B. Assubstantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A sign or symptom by which anything is known, discriminated, or distinguished from anything else.

"Since the motions of the spirit cannot by any certain diagnostic be distinguished from the motions of a man's own heart."—South: Serm., vol. ii., ser. vi.

2. A diagnosis.

"In spite of all the diagnostics and prognostics of State physicians."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.

II. Pathology:

1. The sign or symptom by which a disease is known or distinguished from others.

2. (Pl.) That branch of medical science which deals with the study of the symptoms by which diseases are diagnosed or discriminated; symptomatology.

† Diagnostics are of two kinds: (1) The special or pathognomonic, which are peculiar to a certain disease, and serve to distinguish it from all other diseases; and (2) the adjunct, or such as are common to many diseases.

di-āg-nōs-ti-cāte, v. t. [Eng. diagnostic; -ate.] To diagnose.

di-ā-gōm-ē-tēr, s. [Gr. diagō=to conduct through: diu=through, and agō=to lead.]

Elect.: An electroscope invented by Rousseau, in which the dry pile is employed to measure the amount of electricity transmitted by different bodies, to determine their conductivity. It is used to ascertain the conducting power of oils, as a means of detecting their adulteration.

di-āg-ōn-al, a. & s. [Fr. diagonale; Lat. diagonalis, from Gr. diagonalos=diagonal: diu=through, across; and gonia=a corner, an angle.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II.

2. Lying in an angular or oblique direction.

II. Geom.: Extending from one angle of a quadrilateral figure to the opposite angle; joining the opposite angles of a quadrilateral figure.

"When the parallelogram is divided into two equal triangles by a diagonal line."—Cudworth: Morality, bk. iv., ch. iii.

B. As substantive:

I. Ord. Lang.: In the same sense as II.

II. Technically:

1. Geom.: A line drawn joining the opposite angles of a quadrilateral figure.

"The diameter or diagonal of a square is incommensurable to the sides."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 734.

2. Shipbuilding:

(1) A timber brace, knee, plank, truss, &c., crossing a vessel's timbers obliquely.

(2) A line cutting the body-plan diagonally from the timbers to the middle line.

(3) An oblique brace or stay connecting the horizontal and vertical members of a truss or frame.

Shipbuilding: A manner of boatbuilding in which the outer skin consists of two layers of planking making angles of about 45° with the keel in opposite directions. Diagonal-built boats are constructed upon temporary transverse molds. After setting up and fixing the molds upon the keel, the gunwale, a shelf-piece, and a series of rib-bands are temporarily fixed in the molds. Two layers of planking are then put on, bent to fit the molds and rib-bands, and fastened to each other and to the keel, stem, stern-post, shelf, and gunwale with nails, driven from the outside, and clenched inside upon small rings, called roves. The gunwale is then shored to keep it in shape. The molds and rib-bands are taken out, and floors, hooks, thwart, &c., are put in as in a clinker-built boat.

Fabric: A soft, woolen, twilled material, made in various colors, without any pattern. It measures 52 in. in width, and is much employed for decorative embroidery, and for gentlemen's clothing and ladies' jackets.

Needlework: One of the numerous varieties of couching, a mode of decoration with materials too thick to pass through the lower foundations chiefly used in church work.

diagonal eyepiece, s. Used for solar observations. A very small percentage of the sun's light and heat is reflected from the first surface of a prism, the rest being transmitted.

diagonal framing and stays, s. pl.

Steam-engine: The oblique frame and braces which connect the plumber-block of the paddle-shaft with the framing of the side-lever steam-engine.

diagonal lines, s. pl.

Shipbuilding: Lines showing the boundaries of various parts, formed by sections which are oblique to the vertical longitudinal plane, and which intersect that plane in straight lines parallel to the keel. Usually drawn in red in the draught.

Arch.: A projecting band of stone or timber passing diagonally from one angle of a vaulted ceiling across the center to the opposite angle.

diagonal scale, s.

Draught: A mathematical scale in which the smaller divisions are made by lines that run obliquely across the larger divisions. With the aid of compasses lines can be laid down by such a scale of any required length down to the 200th part of an inch.

diagonal stratification, s.

Geol.: Strata of some size, and having a certain dip, all the beds of which, however, or at least some of them, contain minor layers with a dip different from that of the stratum or bed of which they constitute a part. It is called also cross or false stratification, or sometimes false bedding.

diagonal tie, s. An angle-brace.

diagonal wrench, s. An S-shaped wrench adapted to be used in corners where the ordinary wrench will not turn.

di-āg-ōn-al-ly, adv. [Eng. diagonal; -ly.] In a diagonal direction; obliquely.

"Stitch it across with double silk diagonally."—Watson: Angler, pt. i., ch. v.

di-ā-gō-ni-al, a. [DIAGONAL.] Diagonal. (Milton.) di-āg-ōn-ite, s. [DIAGONAL.]

Min.: The same as BREWSTERITE (q. v.).

di-āg-ōn-ōus, a. [DIAGONAL.]

Bot.: Having four corners.

di-ā-gram, s. [Lat. diagramma=a scale; Gr. diagramma=a figure, or plan; diu=across, through, and gramma=a drawing; graphō=to write, to draw.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II. 1.

2. Any illustrative figure drawn in outline.

"Why do not these persons make a diagram of these cogitative lines and angles?"—Bentley.

II. Technically:

1. Geom.: A drawing or delineation made for the purpose of demonstrating or illustrating some property of a geometrical figure.

"Many a fair precept in poetry is . . . very specious in the diagram, but failing in the mechanic operation."—Dryden.

*2. Musical: A musical scale.

di-ā-gram-māt-ic, a. [Gr. diagramma (genit. diagrammatis), and Eng. adj. suff. -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a diagram; illustrated by a diagram.

"These memoirs are illustrated by thirty-three diagrammatic plates."—London Athenæum.

di-ā-gram-māt-i-cal-ly, adv. [Eng. diagrammatic; -ally.] By means of or in manner of a diagram.

"The terms are diagrammatically placed upon a level."—Sir W. Hamilton.

di-ā-grām-mēt-ēr, s. [English diagram, and meter.] An instrument specially made for measuring the ordinates of indicator-diagrams 5' long, and used much after the manner of a parallel rule, the registering nut on the screw being first placed at zero; when it is required to register a measurement the brake key is depressed, and when all the measurements have been taken the distance the nut has traveled gives the mean ordinate.

di-ā-grāph, s. [Greek diagraphō=to draw or sketch out.] An instrument enabling a person without any knowledge of drawing or perspective to sketch the figures of objects before them. It was invented by M. Gavard, of Paris.

di-ā-grāph-ic, di-ā-grāph-ic-al, a. & s. [Eng. diagraph; -ic, -ical.]

A. As adj.: Descriptive; belonging to the descriptive arts, or to sculpture and engraving.

B. As subst.: The art of design or drawing.

di-ā-grýd-i-āte, s. [Low Lat. diagrydium, diacrydium, diagridium, digredion, corrupt. from Gr. dakrydion=(1) a little tear, (2) a kind of scammony.]

Med.: A strong purgative made with diagrydium.

"All choleric humors ought to be evacuated by diagrydates, mixed with tartar, or some acid, or rhubarb powder."—Floyer.

†di-ā-hē-ll-ō-trōp-ism, s. [Gr. diu=through, across; hēlios=the sun; trōpē=a turning, and Eng. suff. -ism.] A movement of plants in a transverse direction to the light.

"Diacheliotropism may express a position more or less transverse to the light, and induced by it."—Darwin: Movement of Plants, p. 5.

di-al, dy-al, dy-ale, dy-el, s. [Low Lat. dialis=pertaining to a day; dies=a day.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. An instrument for showing the time of day by the sun's shadow. It is evident that the dial having a gnomon which makes with the horizontal plane an angle equal to the latitude of the place is the invention of the Asiatics. When Ahaz went to Damascus to greet his benefactor, about 771 B. C., he saw a beautiful altar, and sent working drawings of it to Urijah, the priest in Jerusalem. An altar was completed against his return. He likewise set up the dial which is mentioned in the account of the miraculous cure of his son Hezekiah, thirteen years after the death of Ahaz. This is perhaps the first dial on record, and is 140 years before Thales, and nearly 400 years before Aristotle and Plato, and just a little previous to the lunar eclipses observed at Babylon, as recorded by Ptolemy. Dials are of various construction, according to the presentation of the plane of the dial.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

(1) The polar-dial has a plane parallel to the axis of the earth and perpendicular to the meridian of the place. In this case the style is parallel to the plane of the dial, and the hour-lines are parallel straight lines, whose distances from the meridional line are respectively proportioned to the tangents of the angles which the hour-planes make with the plane of the meridian.

(2) The common dial has a horizontal plane, and makes with the style an angle equal to the latitude of the place, the style preserving its parallelism to the earth's axis. This becomes a polar-dial at the equator, as the plane of the dial is also parallel to the earth's axis. At other latitudes, the hour-lines intersect each other in the point in which the style intersects the plane of the dial. The angles which the hour-lines make with each other and with the meridional line cutting the XII. depend upon the latitude.

(3) The vertical dial has a plane fixed to a wall, tower, or house. The determination of the hour-lines is similar to the case of the horizontal dial, but the angle formed by the gnomon and dial-plane is the complement of the latitude, the style preserving its parallelism with the earth's axis as before. Varieties of the vertical dial are found with those having presentations east, west, &c. When the plane is east or west, it is in the meridian, is parallel to the vertical plane of the style, and the hour-lines are all parallel. When a wall dial is not perpendicular, it is said to be declined. When it does not face directly one of the four cardinal points, it is called a vertical declined dial. The dial shows true or solar time, and not the mean time of a well-regulated clock. The dial agrees with such a clock four days in the year.

Vertical Dial, Pump Court, Temple, London.

(4) An azimuth dial has a style perpendicular to the plane of the horizon, and marks the sun's azimuth. The pocket sun-dial has a little compass for adjustment, and, of course, is only moderately exact at its calculated latitude. (Knight.)

2. The graduated and numbered face-plate of a watch or clock. A dial-plate.

*3. A watch.

"And then he drew a dial from his poke."
Shakesp.: As You Like It, II. 7.

4. A miner's compass.

II. Technically:

1. Mech.: A circularly graduated plate on which an index-finger marks revolutions, pressure, or what not, in a register, counter, or meter.

2. Lapidary: An instrument for holding the dop on the end of which the gem is cemented while exposed to the lap or wheel. It has adjustments as to inclination, and also axial, with markers indicating degrees in adjustment, so as to portion out the circumference of the stone in facets forming chords of specific arcs at given depths. [ANGULOMETER.]

3. Telegr.: An insulated, stationary wheel having alternating conducting and non-conducting portions, against which the point of a spring key is in frictional contact.

dial-lock, s. A lock provided with one or more dials, having a series of letters or figures on them. Each dial has a hand or pointer connected by a spindle with a wheel inside the lock; on the wheel is a notch which has to be brought into a certain position before the bolt can be moved. There are false notches to add to the difficulty of finding the true notch in each wheel. To adjust the notches to their proper position, a nut on the back of the wheel is loosened, and the pointer is set at any letter or figure chosen by the user. [LOCK, PERMUTATION-LOCK, &c.] (Knight.)

dial-plate, s.

Horol.: The face on which the divisions indicating the hours and minutes are placed.

"His characters are like watches with dial-plates of transparent crystal; they show you the hour like others, and the inward mechanism is all visible."—Carlyle: Heroes and Hero Worship, lect. iii.

dial-wheel, s.

Horol.: One of those wheels placed between the dial and pillar plate of a watch. Also called minute-wheel works.

dial-work, s.

Horol.: The motion work between the dial and movement plate of a watch.

dī-āl, v. t. [DIAL, s.]

*1. Ord. Lang.: To measure with or upon a dial.

"Hours of that true time which is dialled in heaven."
Tatfourd.

2. Min.: To survey by means of a dial.

dī-āl-dāne, s. [Pref. dī; Eng. ald(ol), and suff. -ane.]

Chem.: $C_8H_{14}O_3$. A compound obtained by the action of hydrochloric acid and two molecules of alcohol, $CH_3\cdot CH(OH)\cdot CH_2\cdot CO\cdot H$, a molecule of water being liberated. Daldane dissolves in boiling water, and crystallizes out in cooling in brilliant scales, which melt at 139°. It is only slightly soluble in ether. Its aqueous solution reduces silver oxide with formation of a mirror.

dī-āl-dān'-ic, a. [Eng. daldan(e); suff. -ic.]

daldanic acid, s.

Chem.: $C_8H_{14}O_4$, or \parallel
 $CH\cdot CH(OH)\cdot CH_2\cdot CO\cdot OH$. A monobasic acid, obtained by heating an aqueous solution of daldane with silver oxide, or by the action of potassium permanganate at ordinary temperatures, and is obtained in a free state by decomposing the silver salt with H_2S . It is soluble in water, alcohol, and ether. It forms large colorless monoclinic crystals, which melt at 80° and boil at 198°. It forms crystalline salts.

dī-ā-lēct, s. [Fr. dialecte, from Lat. dialectus=a manner of speaking; Gr. dialektes=discourse, speech, dialect; dialegomai=to discourse, to speak.] [DIALOGUE.]

1. The forms or idioms of a language peculiar to a particular limited district or people, as distinguished from the literary language of the main body of the people. Dialects are influenced in their character by considerations of climatic, physical, and natural peculiarities; they are branches of a parent language modified by time, place, and other accidents, and they frequently retain the true forms of the original tongue.

"Our rustic dialect."—Wordsworth: Michael.

2. A style of language.

"This book was writ in such a dialect, As may the minds of listless men affect."
Bunyan: Apology.

¶ For the difference between dialect and language, see LANGUAGE.

dī-ā-lēct, v. t. [DIALECT, s.] To speak in a dialect.

"By corruption of speech they false dialect and mis-sound it."—Nashe: Leuten Stuff.

dī-ā-lēc-tal, a. [Eng. dialect; -al.] Of or pertaining to a dialect; dialectic.

"The principal dialectal and grammatical peculiarities of the poem."—S. J. Herrtage: Sir Ferumbras (Introd.), p. 20.

dī-ā-lēc-tic, *dī-ā-lēc-tick, dī-ā-lēc-tic-al, a. & s. [Gr. dialektikos, from dialektes=a speech, a dialect (q. v.).]

A. As adjective:

1. Of or pertaining to a dialect or dialects; dialectal.

"This department of dialectical study."—Dr. J. A. H. Murray: Dialects of Scotland, p. 90.

2. Distinguished by or possessing a peculiar dialect.

"A local worker in each dialectical district."—Dr. J. A. H. Murray: Dialects of Scotland, p. 91.

3. Logical, argumentative; pertaining to logic.

"In mere dialectical skill he had very few superiors."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

4. Designed for the study of philosophical questions; as, the Dialectic Society.

B. As subst.: [DIALECTICS.]

dī-ā-lēc-tic-āl-ly, adv. [Eng. dialectical; -ly.]

1. In manner of a dialect; as regards dialect; in a dialect.

"In Latin itself an original d changes dialectically with l."—Max Müller: Selected Essays, i. 498 (note).

2. Logically; in a logical manner.

"He discoursed or reasoned dialectically."—South: Sermons, vol. iv., ser. 1.

dī-ā-lēc-tī'-cian, s. [Eng. dialectic; -ian.] One skilled in dialectics; a logician, a reasoner.

"Let us see if doctors or dialecticians Will dare to dispute my definitions."
Longfellow: Golden Legend, vi.

dī-ā-lēc-tics, *dī-ā-lēc-tiques, dī-ā-lēc-tic, s. [Gr. hē dialektikē technē=the art of logic or reasoning; dialegomai=to discourse, to reason.]

1. Of the form dialectics:

1. That branch of logic which teaches the rules and methods of reasoning or arguing, or of discriminating truth from error; the application of logical principles to discursive reasoning. By Plato it was used in the following senses:

(1) Discussion by dialogue, as a method of scientific investigation.

(2) A method of investigating truth by analysis.

(3) The science of ideas, or of nature and the law of being.

2. The logic of probabilities, as opposed to the doctrine of demonstration and scientific deduction.

II. Of the form dialectic:

1. The logic of appearances or illusions, whether these arise from accident or error, or from those necessary limitations which originate in the constitution of the human intellect. As logical or formal, it treats of the sources of error or illusion and their destruction: as transcendental, it is the exposure of that natural error or illusion arising from human reason itself, which is ever inclined to look upon phenomena as things in themselves, and cognitions a priori as properties adhering to these things, and in such way to form the super-sensible, according to this assumed cognition of things in themselves. (Ogilvie, &c.)

2. The method of dissecting, dividing, sub-dividing, and analyzing a subject, so as to ascertain the proper arguments by which to investigate, attack, or defend it.

dī-ā-lēc-tōl'-ō-gēr, s. [Gr. dialektes=... a dialect; logos=a discourse, and Eng. suff. -er.] One who studies or is skilled in dialectology.

"The county presents to the dialectologist two varieties of English dialect."—Athenum, April 23, 1881.

dī-ā-lēc-tōl'-ō-gist, s. [Eng. dialectology(y); -ist.] A dialectologist.

dī-ā-lēc-tōl'-ō-gy, s. [Gr. dialektes... a dialect, and logos=a discourse.] That branch of philology which deals with the nature and relation of dialects.

dī-ā-lēc-tōr, s. [Eng. dialect; -or.] One skilled in dialectics; a dialectician.

dī-āl-ing, s. & a. [Eng. dial; -ing.]

A. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: The art, science, or act of constructing dials.

2. Mining: Surveying with a dial, a method followed by miners to determine the course of a vein.

B. As adj.: Used in the art of dialing. (Ash.)

dialing-globe, s. An instrument for drawing all sorts of dials. (Ash.)

dialing lines, or scale, s. Graduated lines or rules on the edges of quadrants, &c., made to facilitate the construction of dials.

dialing-sphere, s. A dialing-globe.

dī-āl-ist, s. [Eng. dial; -ist.] A constructor of dials.

"Scientific dialists... have found out rules to mark out the irregular motion of the shadow in all latitudes and planes."—Mozon: Mech. Dialing.

dī-āl-kāl'-ā-mide, s. [Pref. dī; Eng. alkal(i), and amide.]

Chem.: An organic nitrogenous compound derived from two molecules of ammonia, by replacing the hydrogen partly by acid and partly by basic radicals, as Ethyl-carbamide, $N_2\cdot CO\cdot C_2H_5\cdot H_3$; dimethyl-oxamide, $N_2\cdot (CH_3)_2\cdot (C_2O)_2\cdot H_2$.

dī-āl-lāge, dī-āl'-lā-gē, s. [Gr. diallagē=an interchange, a difference: diō=between, and allasseō=to change.]

1. Rhet. (always as dī-āl-lā-gē): A figure of speech by which arguments, having been first considered from various points of view, are then brought all to bear on one point.

2. Min.: A non-aluminous variety of pyroxene; color grayish-green to bright grass-green; luster of cleavage surface pearly, sometimes metalloid or brassy. Hardness, 4; specific gravity, 3.2-3.35. Common, especially in serpentine rocks.

¶ (1) Metalloidal diallage:

Min.: The same as ENSTATITE (q. v.).

(2) Green diallage:

Min.: The same as SMARAGDITE (q. v.).

dī-āl-lāg'-ic, a. [Eng. diallag(e); -ic.] Pertaining to or formed of diallage.

diallagic-augite, diallagoid-augite, s. A form of pyroxene intermediate in character between augite and diallage. Its sections can be distinguished from ordinary augite by the occurrence of straight and parallel fissures or striae, which, in the longitudinal sections of the crystals, cross the coarser cleavage planes at angles from 70° to 90°. The mineral is not dichroic, and polarizes in strong colors, the crystal sections sometimes presenting iris-colored margins.

dī-āl-lēl, a. [Gr. dia=through, across, and allēlōn=of one another. (Cf. parallel.)] Crossing, intersecting.

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōwī; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tīon, -gion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūsh. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

di-äl-lö-gite, s. [DIALOGITE.]

di-äl-löl, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and Eng. allyl (q. v.).]

Chem.: C_6H_{10} , or $H_2C=CH\cdot CH_2\cdot CH_2\cdot CH=CH_2$. A hydrocarbon obtained by the action of sodium on allyl iodide, $H_2C=CH\cdot CH_2I$, and by distilling allylmercuric-iodide, C_3H_5HgI , with potassium cyanide, KCN. Diallyl is a pungent ethereal liquid, boiling at 59°. It unites with bromine, forming a crystalline tetrabromide, $C_6H_{10}Br_4$, which melts at 63°.

diallyl-carbinol, s.

Chem.: $(C_3H_5)_2CH(OH)$. A monatomic alcohol obtained by the action of zinc on a mixture of allyl iodide, C_3H_5I , and ethyl formate, $H\cdot CO\cdot OC_2H_5$. The crude product consists of diallyl and diallyl-carbinol and a high-boiling product. Diallyl-carbinol boils at 151°, unites with bromine, forming a tetrabromide. Pentachloride of phosphorus, PCl_5 , forms a combination known as mono-chlor-heptene, C_7H_7Cl , or $(C_3H_5)_3CH\cdot C$, which boils at 140°, being partly converted into heptene, C_7H_{10} , which boils at 115°.

diallyl-urea, s.

Chem.: Diallyl-carbamide, sinapoline, $C_7H_{12}N_2O$, or $N_2(CO)\cdot(C_3H_5)_2$. Obtained by the action of oxide of lead on sulpho-cyanate of allyl (oil of mustard), C_3H_5CNS , or by heating cyanate of allyl, C_3H_5CNO , with water. It crystallizes in shining laminae, which melt at 100°, and is soluble in alcohol and ether. The aqueous solution is alkaline to test paper.

di-äl-löl-ène, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold; Eng. allyl (q. v.), and suff. -ène.]

Chem.: A hydrocarbon, C_6H_6 , isomeric with benzene. [PROPARGYLENE.]

di-a-lög-ic-al, a. [Gr. dialogikos, from dialogos=a dialogue (q. v.).] Pertaining to or of the nature of a dialogue.

"That dialogical disposition with Zacharias."—Burton: Anat. Melan., p. 258.

di-a-lög-ic-al-lý, adv. [Eng. dialogical; -ly.] After the manner of a dialogue; by way of dialogue.

di-äl-ö-gism, s. [Gr. dialogisma=a discourse or argument.] An imaginary conversation or dialogue between two or more persons.

"Enlarging what they would say by bold and unusual metaphors, by their dialogisms and colloquies."—Stokes: On the Minor Prophets (1659), Pref.

di-äl-ö-gist, s. [Eng. dialogue (ue); -ist.]

1. One who takes part in a dialogue.

"Varro, one of the dialogists, said to him."—Warburton: Div. Leg., bk. iii., ch. iii.

2. A writer of dialogues.

"The characters or personages employed by our new orthodox dialogists."—Shaftesbury: Miscell. Refl., ch. ii., mis. 5.

di-a-lög-ist-ic, a. [Gr. dialogistikos, from dialogos=a dialogue.] Having the form or nature of a dialogue.

di-a-lög-ist-ic-al, a. [Eng. dialogistic; -al.] Making use of dialogue.

"Two dialogistical conjurers, with their dramatic enchantments, change the scene."—Icon. Lib. or Hist. of Pamphlets (1715), p. 185.

di-a-lög-ist-ic-al-lý, adv. [Eng. dialogistical; -ly.] By way of dialogue; dialogically.

"In his Prophecy he [Malachi] proceeds most dialogically."—Bp. Richardson: On the Old Testament, p. 449.

di-äl-ö-gite, s. [Gr. dialogē=doubt, and Eng. suff. -ite.]

Min.: The same as RHODONOSITE (q. v.).

di-äl-ö-gize, di-äl-ö-gulze, v. t. [Gr. dialogizomai=to argue, to discourse.] To discourse in dialogue.

"These interlocutory and dialoguing dreams were not unknown even to the very heathens."—Fotherby: Atheomastix, p. 126.

di-a-lögus, s. [Fr. dialogue; Sp., Port. & Ital. dialogo, from Lat. dialogos; Gr. dialogos=a conversation; dialogomai=to converse.]

1. A conversation or discourse between two or more persons; a formal conversation, as in theatrical performances, &c., in which two or more persons carry on a conversation.

"In that dialogue betwixt him and Peter."—Burton: Anat. Melan., p. 258.

2. A written composition in which a subject is treated by way of an imaginary conversation between two or more persons.

"It is somewhat singular that so many modern dialogue-writers should have failed in this particular."—Warton: Essay on Pope.

¶ For the difference between dialogue and conversation, see CONVERSATION.

di-a-lögue, v. i. & t. [DIALOGUE, s.]

A. Intrans.: To hold a dialogue; to converse, to confer.

"Dost dialogue with thy shadow?"

Shaksp.: Timon, ii. 2.

B. Trans.: To put into the form of a dialogue.

"And dialogued for him what he would say."

Ask'd their own wills, and made their wills obey."

Shaksp.: Lover's Complaint, 132, 133.

di-a-löse, s. [Mod. Lat. dial(um), and Eng., &c., suff. -ose.]

Chem.: A substance resembling disintegrated cellulose obtained from the pericarp of a Chinese leguminous plant (a species of Dialium). It swells up in water to a bulky, colorless jelly, the gummy part of which is not precipitated by baryta water, basic lead acetate, or alcohol. The desiccated amorphous substance dissolves in strong sulphuric acid, but does not thereby acquire the property of being colored by iodine.

di-a-lür-a-mide, s. [English dialur(ic), and amide.]

Chemistry: $C_4H_5N_3O_3$, or $N(C_4H_5N_3O_3)_2H_2$. An amide obtained by mixing together alloxantin and chloride ammonium solutions, freed from air by boiling; it crystallizes out in white hard needles, which are turned red by traces of ammonia; they are insoluble in cold water. By the action of nitrous acid it is converted into alloxan; by boiling with ammonia, dialuramide yields murexide.

di-a-lür-äte, s. [DIALURIC ACID.]

di-a-lür-ic, a. [Pref. di; Eng. al(loxan), and uric.]

dialuric-acid, s.

Inorganic Chemistry: $C_4H_4N_2O_4$. Tartronyl-urea, $CO<\begin{smallmatrix} NH\cdot CO \\ NH\cdot CO \end{smallmatrix}>CH\cdot OH$. Obtained by reducing alloxan with zinc and hydrochloric acid, and from dibrom-barbituric acid, by reducing it with H_2S . Dialuric acid crystallizes in needles, and forms compounds with metals, called dialurates. It turns red in the air, absorbing oxygen, and is converted into alloxantin.

di-äl-y-car-pois, a. [Gr. dialyō=to separate, and karpōs=fruit.]

Bot.: Applied to plants of which the carpels are not united, but of which the fruit is composed of several free carpels.

di-äl-y-pët-a-lös, s. pl. [Gr. dialyō=to separate, and petalon=a leaf.]

Bot.: The same as POLYPETALA (q. v.).

di-a-lýph-ýl-loüs, a. [Gr. dialyō=to separate, and phyllon=a leaf.]

Bot.: The same as DIALYSEFALOUS (q. v.).

di-a-lýse, di-a-lýze, v. t. [DIALYSIS.]

Chem.: To separate by a dialyzer, or the process of dialysis (q. v.).

di-äl-y-sép-a-loüs, a. [Gr. dialyō=to separate; Eng. sepal, and suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Applied to flowers, the calices of which are separate; polysepalous.

di-a-lýs-ër, di-a-lýz-ër, s. [Eng. dialys(e); -er.]

Chem.: The parchment paper or septum stretched over a wood or india-rubber ring, used in the process of dialysis.

di-äl-y-sis, s. [Gr. dialysis=a loosening, a separating; dia (intens.), and lyō=to loose, to dissolve.]

1. Rhet.: A figure of speech, by which connectives are omitted; asyndeton.

2. Print.: The same as DIERESIS (q. v.).

3. Med.: Exhaustion, weakness, loss of strength.

4. Chem.: A process of analysis depending upon the differential rate of the diffusion of liquids through porous septa. Uncrystallizable bodies diffuse much more slowly than crystallizable ones, so that sugar may be separated from gum or salt from gelatine by merely allowing their solutions in water to be subjected to the action of a parchment paper septum or dialysis for a few hours. The septum is stretched over a wood or india-rubber ring, the edges drawn up and fastened by an outer rim. It is then allowed to float on water. The substance to be dialyzed is poured on to the septum, when diffusion immediately begins, the crystallized elements passing through and being dissolved in the pure water, while the colloid remains behind. Dialysis affords an easy method of detecting the presence of poisons, most of those commonly used being crystallizable, as arsenic, strychnine, oxalic acid, &c. [COLLOID, CRYSTALLOID.]

di-a-lýt-ic, a. [Gr. dialytikos=able to dissolve, from dialyō.] Pertaining to dialysis; unloosing, relaxing.

di-a-mäg-net, s. [Gr. dia=through, and Eng. magnet (q. v.).] A body or substance having diamagnetic polarity.

di-a-mäg-nët-ic, a. & s. [Gr. dia=through, across, and Eng. magnetic (q. v.).]

A. As adj.: Pertaining to or exhibiting the phenomena of diamagnetism. The term is applied to certain bodies which, when magnetized and suspended freely, take up a position at right angles to the magnetic meridian—that is, either due west or due east. The principal of such substances are antimony, bismuth, cadmium, copper, gold, lead, mercury, silver, tin, zinc, and most solid, liquid, or gaseous substances.

"For diamagnetic substances (such as bismuth) it is negative."—Everett: The C. G. S. System of Units (1875), ch. x., p. 59.

B. As subst.: A substance which, when magnetized and suspended freely, takes up a position at right angles to the magnetic meridian.

di-a-mäg-nët-ic-al-lý, adv. [Eng. diamagnetic; -al; -ly.] In a diamagnetic manner; according to the principles of diamagnetism.

di-a-mäg-net-ism, s. [Gr. dia=through, across, and Eng. magnetism (q. v.).]

1. That branch of magnetism which treats of diamagnetic substances and phenomena.

2. That influence which causes a substance, when magnetized and suspended freely, to take up a position at right angles to the magnetic meridian.

di-a-män-tine, a. [Mid. Eng. diamant=adamant, diamond, and Eng. adj. suff. -ine.] Adamantine.

"In Destiny's hard diamantine rock."

Sylvester: Du Bartas (1621), p. 82.

di-äm-et-ër, diametre, s. [Fr. diamètre; Lat. diametros; Gr. diametros=a diagonal, a diameter; diametreō=to measure through or across; dia=through, across, and metreō=to measure.]

I. Ord. Lang.: The length of a line passing through the center of any object from one side to the other; hence, equivalent to the width or thickness of the body.

"The bay of Naples is the most delightful one that I ever saw; it lies in almost a round figure of about thirty miles in the diameter."—Addison: Italy.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: The measure across the lower part of the shaft of a column. This being divided into sixty parts, called minutes, gives a scale by which all the parts of the order can be measured. A module is half the diameter, or thirty minutes.

2. Geometry:

(1) A line drawn passing through the center of a circle or other curvilinear figure, and terminating each way in the circumference. That point which bisects all lines drawn through a figure from side to side is called a center, and every line drawn through a center and terminating in the circumference or opposite boundaries is a diameter. Every circle has an infinite number of diameters. A diameter which is perpendicular to the chords which it bisects is called an axis. A circle has an infinite number of axes, every diameter being an axis. The parabola has one axis, and each of the other conic sections two axes.

(2) A diagonal (q. v.).

di-a-mët-räl, di-a-mët-räll, a. & s. [Eng. diameter; -äl.]

A. As adjective:

1. Of or pertaining to a diameter.

2. Diametrical; directly opposed.

"So diametrical

One to another, and so much opposed."

Ben Jonson: Magnetic Lady, l. 1.

B. As subst.: A diameter, a diagonal.

"By decussative diametrals, quincuncial lines and angles."—Brown: Garden of Cyrus, ch. iii.

diametral-curve, s.

Math.: A curved line which bisects a system of parallel chords drawn in any given curve.

Math.: A plane which bisects a system of parallel chords drawn in a surface. If a diametral plane is perpendicular to the chords which it bisects, it is called a principal plane of the surface.

Math.: A curved surface, which bisects a system of parallel chords drawn in the surface, a particular case of which is the diametral plane.

di-a-mët-räl-lý, adv. [Eng. diametral; -ly.] Diametrically; in a directly opposite manner.

"Christian piety is, beyond all other things, diametrically opposed to profaneness and impiety of actions."—Hammond.

di-a-mët-ric-al, di-a-mët-ric, a. [Eng. diameter; -äl; -ic.]

1. Lit.: Of or pertaining to a diameter; forming or describing a diameter.

fäte, fät, färe, amidst, whät, fäll, father; wö, wët, hère, camël, hër, thère; plne, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gö, pöt, or, wöre, wölf, wörk, whö, sön; müte, cüb, cüre, unite, cür, rüle, füll; trý, sýrian. æ, œ = é; ey = ä. qu = kw.

2. Fig.: Directly opposed; as far removed as possible, as though at the opposite ends of a diameter.

"The sin of calumny is set in a most diametrical opposition to the evangelical precept of loving our neighbors as ourselves."—Government of the Tongue.

di-a-mêtr-ic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. diametrical; -ly.]

1. Lit.: Like a diameter; directly across or opposite.

"Thus intercepted in its passage, the vapor, which cannot penetrate the stratum diametrically, glides along the lower surface of it."—Woodward.

2. Fig.: In a manner directly opposed or opposite.

"A public functionary might receive diametrically opposite orders."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

di-a-mic-tôn, s. [Gr. dia=through, and miktos=mixed, blended.]

Arch.: The Roman method of building a wall, with regular ashlar work on the outsides, and filled in with rubble between. It is similar to embleton (q. v.), but without the diatoni, or binding stones, which go through the thickness of the walls, showing on both sides. (Graitt.)

di-a-mide, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and Eng., &c., amide (q. v.).]

Chem.: A name given to organic nitrogenous bodies which are derived from two molecules of ammonia, $N_2H_5 \cdot H_2H_2$; the hydrogen being replaced wholly or partly by acid radicals. Diamides are divided into: (1) Primary diamides, in which two atoms of hydrogen are replaced by one diatomic acid radical, as oxamide, $N_2(C_2O_2) \cdot H_2H_2$. These differ from the normal ammonium salts of their acids in containing two atoms less of water. They can be formed by the action of ammonia on the ethers of the acids, or on the chlorides of acid radicals, by heating normal ammonium salts of dibasic acids. When boiled with dilute acids they take up two molecules of H_2O , and yield the acid and NH_3 . With nitrous acid, HNO_2 , they evolve nitrogen, and the acid is reformed. Thus oxamide, $N_2C_2O_2H_4 + 2HNO_2 = 2N_2 + 2H_2O + (COOH)_2$ oxalic acid. (2) Secondary diamides, in which four atoms of hydrogen are replaced by two diatomic acid radicals, or by one diatomic and two monatomic acid radicals. (3) Tertiary diamides, in which all the hydrogen is replaced by acid radicals, of which one at least must be dibasic, as trisuccinamide, which is formed by the action of argentic succinamide, $2(N \cdot C_4H_3O_2 \cdot Ag)$, on chloride of succinyl, $C_4H_3O_2Cl_2 = N_2(C_4H_3O_2)_3$. (Watts: Dict. of Chem.) di-âm-id-ô, in compos. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and Eng., &c., amido (q. v.).]

Chem.: Compounds in which the radical amido- (NH_2) is contained twice, having replaced two atoms of hydrogen, as diamido-benzene, $C_6H_4(NH_2)_2$.

di-a-mine, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and Eng. amine (q. v.).]

Chem.: A compound derived from two molecules of ammonia, $N_2H_5 \cdot H_2H_2$, by replacing the hydrogen wholly or partly by basic radicals. Diamines are divided into: (1) Primary diamines, in which two atoms of hydrogen are replaced by one diatomic base radical, as ethylen-amine, $N_2(C_2H_4) \cdot H_2$. (2) Secondary diamines, in which four atoms of hydrogen are replaced by two diatomic base radicals, as di-ethylen-amine, $N_2(C_2H_4)_2 \cdot H_2$. Both the primary and secondary amines are formed by the action of ethylen-bromide on ammonia. They contain the diatomic hydrocarbon radical ethylen, C_2H_4 . (3) Tertiary diamines, in which all the hydrogen is replaced, either by three diatomic base radicals, as tri-ethylen-amine, $N_2(C_2H_4)_3$, or by two diatomic and two monatomic basic radicals, as di-ethylen-diphenyl-amine, $N_2(C_2H_4)_2 \cdot (C_6H_5)_2$, which is formed by the action of chloride of ethylene on phenyl-amine. (Watts: Dict. of Chem.) di-a-mônd, di-a-maunde*, di-a-maunt*, di-ay-mont*, dy-a-mand*, dy-a-mawnte*, dy-a-mownte*, s. & a. [Fr. diamant, constructed upon admant, a shortened form of admant = adamant. Diez, in his Wörterbuch d. roman. Sprachen, p. 123, supposes that it was under the influence of the word difano=translucent, that admant in Ital. was changed into diamante. Sp. diente; Ger. & Dut. diamant. A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. Adamant.

"Then Zeal, whose substance is ethereal, arming in complete diamond."—Milton: Apology for Smeatymnus.

2. In the same sense as II. 5.

II. Technically:

1. Geom.: A geometrical figure, a lozenge or rhomb. The name is conferred upon nuts and bolt-heads of that form; also upon gravers which are rhombal, and not square in cross-section.

2. Glazing: A small piece of diamond, mounted in a handle, used for cutting glass; a glazier's diamond (q. v.).

3. Print.: A small kind of type used in English printing.

4. Cards:

(1) Sing.: One of a suit in a pack of cards, the pips on which are diamond-shaped.

(2) Pl.: A suit of such cards.

5. Min.: An isometric mineral or precious stone, found of various colors, from white or colorless, through yellow, red, orange, green, blue or brown, to black. It is transparent and translucent, with octahedral cleavage, highly perfect. It is composed of pure carbon, and can be completely burned to carbon dioxide between the poles of a powerful battery. The back planes reflect all the light that strikes them at an angle exceeding $24^\circ 13'$, whence comes the peculiar brilliancy of the gem. It is the hardest substance known, being able to scratch all other minerals. Hardness, 10; specific gravity, 3.52-3.55. When cut and polished, a diamond of the purest water weighing one carat is worth about \$100. [CARAT.] The value of heavier stones, up to twenty carats, is calculated by multiplying the square of the weight in carats by the price per carat; above twenty carats the value increases at a much more rapid rate. The slightest tinge of color greatly affects the commercial value. Blue is an exceedingly rare color, and one of this shade, known as the "Hope" diamond, though only weighing 44 carats, but of peculiar beauty and brilliancy, is valued at \$125,000. Diamonds are found in several regions; the principal localities now are Brazil (the mines in which were first opened in 1727), and South Africa, the mines of which were discovered and passed under British rule in 1867-70. Fine ones have also been met with in parts of India. Diamonds are used for many purposes. The powder is used by the lapidary for polishing gems; small fragments are set and used by glaziers for cutting glass [GLAZIER'S DIAMOND], while larger specimens are used for boring or drilling [DIAMOND-DRILL]. They are also used by engravers for etching-points. They are cut in various forms, and the value is commonly increased threefold by skillful cutting.

Sir Isaac Newton suggested that the diamond is combustible, but the first to establish the fact were the Florentine Academicians, in 1694; they succeeded in burning it in the focus of a large lens. Lavoisier, in 1772, examined the results of combustion, which showed it to be pure crystalline form of carbon. Among the celebrated diamonds may be noted the following:

Great Mogul, found in 1550, in Golconda, and seen by Tavernier. Weighed 793 carats; cut to 279 carats (carat=4 grains).

Austrian, a rose-cut diamond weighing 139½ carats.

The great Russian diamond weighs 183 carats, or 1 oz. 12 dwts. 4 gr. troy. The empress Catherine II. offered for it $500,000, besides an annuity for life to the owner of $5,000, which was refused; but it was afterward sold to Catherine's favorite, Count Orloff, for the first-mentioned sum, without the annuity, and was by him presented to the empress on her birthday, 1772; it is now in the scepter of Russia.

The Pitt (or Regent) diamond weighed 400 carats, and after cutting, 136 carats; it was sold to the king of France for $625,000, in 1720.

The Pigott diamond was sold for $47,500 May 10, 1802.

The Kohinoor, or Mountain of Light, has a legendary history, and is said to have belonged in turn to Shah Jehan, Aurungzebe, Nadir Shah, the Afghan rulers, and afterward to the East Indian Sikh chief Runjeet Singh. Upon the abdication of Dhuleep Singh, the last ruler of the Punjab, and the annexation of his dominions to the British empire, in 1849, the Kohinoor was surrendered to the Queen of England. It was accordingly taken to England and presented to her, July 3, 1850. Its original weight was nearly 800 carats, but it was reduced by the unskillfulness of the artist, Hortensio Borghese, a Venetian, to 279 carats. Its shape and size resembled the pointed half (rose cut) of a small hen's egg. The value is scarcely computable. This diamond was recut in 1852, and now weighs 102¼ carats. The Sanci diamond, which belonged to Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, was bought by Sir J. Jejeebhoy from the Demidoff family for $100,000, in February, 1865.

Mr. Porter Rhodes' great diamond, weighing 150 carats, alleged value $300,000, found at Kimberley, South Africa, Feb. 12, 1880.

A diamond, termed the Star of the South, from Brazil, in 1855, weighing 234½ carats, half of which was lost by cutting.

Diamonds were discovered in Cape Colony, South Africa, in March, 1867. A fine one from there termed the "Star of South Africa," after cutting weighed 46½ carats, and was valued at $125,000.

The largest African diamond found, weighing 302 carats, at Kimberley, named "Victoria," March 27, 1874.

Several magnificent South African diamonds have since been discovered—one said to weigh 400 carats, reduced by cutting to 180; 1884-8.

B. As adjective:

1. Made or set with diamonds; as, a diamond bracelet.

2. Resembling a diamond in shape; diamond-shaped.

† Obvious compounds: Diamond-hilted, diamond-merchant, diamond-mine.

diamond-beetle, s.

Entom.: Entimus imperialis, a splendid coleopterous insect belonging to the family Curculionidae. It is a native of South America.

diamond-borer, s. [DIAMOND-DRILL.]

diamond-bort, s. Fragments of diamonds which are too small for jewelry.

diamond-cutter, s. One whose trade is to cut diamonds.

Diamond-cutter's compass:

Diamond-cutting: An instrument used to measure the inclination of the sides of jewels. It is a movable arm inserted at an angle of 45° into a metallic base.

diamond-cutting, s. The art of cutting diamonds. Until 1476, when de Berghem, of Bruges, first discovered this art, the diamond in Europe was worn uncut; the four great stones in the mantle of Charlemagne furnishing an example; but the art was practiced long before in India, the facing of the Kohinoor dating back into uncertain time. The diamond is cut in three forms, the Brilliant, the Rose, and the Table, and their respective values are in the order named. The form a diamond shall assume is determined by its shape in the rough, the duty of the lapidary being to cut it so as to sacrifice as little as possible of the stone, and obtain the greatest surface, refraction, and general beauty. Having decided upon the form, a model is made in lead and kept before the workman as a copy. The rough diamond is cemented to a handle, called a dop, leaving the part exposed which is to be removed to form one facet. The projecting portion is then removed by attrition against another diamond similarly set in a handle, or by means of diamond-dust and oil upon a disk, wheel, or wire, according to circumstances. When a facet is finished, the stone is reset in the handle and the process repeated. Several months are expended in cutting large stones, as the work proceeds very slowly. The polishing is performed upon a rapidly revolving iron wheel, driven by a band, and fed by hand with diamond-dust and oil. The diamond is set in a dop as before, on the end of a weighted arm, and held against the wheel; the results of the process being collected in a box for future operations.

diamond-draft, s.

Weaving: A method of drawing the warp threads through the heddles.

diamond-drill, s. A drill armed with a diamond, which cuts its way into the material as the drill-stock is rotated. It was invented by Hermann, and patented in France by him, June 3, 1854. He states that he makes crystals or angular fragments of the black diamond useful in "working, turning, and polishing, &c., hard stones such as granite, porphyry, marbles, &c." The diamond is broken to obtain angular fragments, which are imbedded by alloys in the metallic stock, to form a cutting-tool. Diamond-drills were used in the Mont Cenis Tunnel.

diamond-edition, s.

Bibliog.: A term applied to books printed in diamond type.

diamond-feet, s.

Arch.: A species of molding formed of fillets intersecting each other in such a manner as to form diamond-shaped or rhomboidal figures.

diamond-gauge, s. A gauge employed by jewelers in estimating the sizes of small diamonds. In the staff are set small crystals of graduated sizes by which jewels are compared. The crystals are from ¼ to ½ of a carat.

diamond-headed, a. Having a diamond-shaped or rhomboidal head.

Diamond-headed bolt*: A bolt whose head has a lozenge or rhomboidal shape.

diamond-jousts, s. Jousts instituted by King Arthur, "who by that name had named them since a diamond was the prize." Before he was king he came by accident to a glen in Lyonesse, where two brothers had met in combat. Each was slain; but one had worn a crown of diamonds which Arthur picked up, and when he became king offered the nine diamonds as the prize of nine several jousts, "one every year, a joust for one." Lancelot had won eight and intended to present them all to the Queen, "when all were won." When the knight at last laid them all at her feet, Guinevere in a fit of jealous rage flung them out of the palace window into the river.

bêil, bôy; pout, jowl; cat, cell, chorus, qhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

diamond-knot, s. A kind of knot made at equidistant intervals on a rope, to give support to the hand or foot.

diamond-lens, s.

Optics: The diamond-lens, owing to its high refractive and small dispersive power, requires much less curvature than glass lenses of the same focal length. It therefore admits of the employment of a larger pencil of rays, and gives more light. A diamond and a plate-glass lens of similar form and radius are in their comparative magnifying powers as eight is to three.

diamond-linen, s.

Fabric: [DIAPER.]

diamond-mortar, s. Diamonds for the use of the lapidary are crushed in a mortar, which consists of a cylindrical box and a pestle, both made of hardened steel. A small rough diamond is placed in the mortar, and the pestle driven down by a hammer. The pieces of broken diamond are examined for the detection of fragments suitable for gravers, drills, and etching points. The remainder is mashed to an impalpable powder by several hours' continued work, rotating the pestle between blows.

diamond-nail, s. A nail having a rhombal head.

diamond-plow, s. A small plow having a mold-board and share of a diamond shape, that is, rhomboidal. One side of the rhomb runs level on the ground, another forms the breast, and the other two are the marginal lines of the backward extension of the mold-board.

diamond-point, s.

Engraving: A stylus armed with a diamond, either ground conical or made of a selected fragment of the desired shape. Wilson Lowry introduced the diamond-point into engravers' ruling-machines. Etching-tools have been pointed with diamonds. Diamond-points are used in ruling the graduation of the finer kinds of instruments, also by Nobert, it is supposed, in ruling the wonderful series of lines that form the tests of the microscopes of higher powers.

† Diamond-point chisel: A chisel whose corners are ground off obliquely.

diamond-powder, s. The fine dust produced by a diamond-mortar (q. v.).

diamond-shaped, a.

1. Ord. Lang.: Shaped like a diamond; of a lozenge or rhomboidal shape.

2. Bot.: Applied to leaves somewhat resembling a diamond in shape, having the opposite sides equal, and the angles two acute and two obtuse.

diamond-spar, s.

[CORUNDUM.]

diamond-tool, s.

Metal-working: A metal-turning tool whose cutting edge is formed by facets.

diamond-work, s.

Masonry: Reticulated work formed by courses of lozenge-shaped stones, very common in ancient masonry.

di-a-mônd-éd, a. [Eng. diamond; -éd.] Of the shape of a diamond or lozenge; diamond-shaped.

"Diamonded or streaked in the fashion of a lozenge."—Fulter: Profane State, p. 368.

di-a-mor-phæ, s. [Greek diamorphos=endued with form.]

Bot.: A genus of Crassulaceæ, the typical one of the tribe Diamorpheæ. The branches and flowers are whorled, the fruit a four-celled capsule. A native of this country.

di-a-mor-phæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. diamorph(a), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Crassulaceæ, type Diamorpha (q. v.).

di-âm-yî, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and Eng. &c., amyl.]

Chem.: Decyl hydride, $C_{10}H_{22}$. A hydrocarbon obtained by the action of sodium on amyl iodide, a colorless liquid, boiling at 156°. It mixes with alcohol, but not with water. It has an agreeable smell and burning taste.

di-âm-yî-lène, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold; Eng. &c., amyl, and suff. -ene.]

Chem.: $C_{10}H_{20}$. A hydrocarbon prepared by shaking together one volume of pure amylene, C_5H_{10} , with two volumes of strong sulphuric acid and one volume of water in stoppered cylinders immersed in ice-cold water. Pure diamylene is obtained by fractional distillation. It boils at 150°. Diamylene combines with bromine.

Di-ân-a, s.

[Lat.]

1. Rom. Mythol.: The Latin name of the Greek Artemis, the goddess of the chase. She was also invoked as Lucina in childbirth. In later times she was confounded with Luna, or the Moon. Her most famous temple was at Ephesus. It was considered one of the seven wonders of the world.

2. Astron.: An asteroid, the 78th found. It was discovered by the astronomer Luther, on March 15, 1863.

3. Alchemy: The name given by the alchemists to the metal silver; the dendritic amalgam, precipitated by mercury from a solution of nitrate of silver, was called Arbor Diane. Silver was supposed to be under the influence of the moon, Luna, hence the term lunar caustic applied to fused nitrate of silver, $AgNO_3$, Diana being the goddess of the moon.

Diana-monkey, s.

Zool.: Cercopithecus Diana, the Simia Diana of Linnaeus, or Palatine-monkey of Pennant, an African species of monkey, so named from the crescent-shaped band, resembling that which poets and mythologists assign to the goddess Diana.

Head of Diana-monkey.

di-a-nât-ic, a. [Greek dianâo=to flow through.] Reasoning, logically and progressively, from one subject to another; using a concatenative and sequential argument.

di-ân-chôr-a, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and Gr. angkyra=an anchor, a hook.]

Paleont.: A genus of fossil Conchifera, the shells of which are delicate, adherent, regular, symmetrical, equilateral, subarticulated, and inequivalve; one valve hollowed within and convex without, the other flat; the hinge composed of two distant condyles. It is now called Spondylus (q. v.).

di-ân-dêr, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and andêr (genit. andros)=a male, a man.]

Bot.: A flower which has two stamens. Example, Veronica.

di-ân-dri-a, s. [For the first element see dian-; Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ia.]

Bot.: In the Linnaean system the second class containing those genera of plants, the flowers of which have only two stamens, provided these are neither united at the base nor combined with the pistil and stigma nor separated from the pistil.

di-ân-dri-an, di-ân-drois, a. [English dian- (e); -ian; -ous.]

Bot.: Applied to plants which have two stamens.

di-a-nêl-læ, s. [From Diana, the goddess.]

Bot.: A genus of Liliaceæ, tribe Asparagææ. They have drooping blue flowers in panicles. They occur in Australia and the south of Asia. The powdered roots of Dianella odorata are made into fragrant pastilles. A decoction of it is prescribed in Java for gonorrhœa, dysuria, and fluor albus.

di-a-nîte, s. [Latin Dian(a); English suff. -ite (Min.) (q. v.).]

Min.: The same as COLUMBITE (q. v.).

di-a-nô-êt-ic, a. [Gr. dianoëtikos=capable of thought, intellectual.] Capable of thought; intellectual; of or pertaining to the discursive faculty.

di-a-nô-îl-ô-gy, s. [Gr. dianoia=thought, and logos=a discourse.] That branch of philosophy which treats of the dianoëtic faculties. (Sir W. Hamilton.)

di-ân-thûs, s. [Gr. dios=divine, and anthos=a flower.]

Bot.: A genus of Caryophyllaceæ, sub-order Sile-neæ. Calyx tubular, five-toothed, surrounded by about four imbricated scales or bracteoles; petals five, furnished with claws; stamens ten; styles two; capsule cylindrical, one-celled; seeds peltate.

di-a-pâgm, s. [Gr. diapasma, from diapassô=to sprinkle.] Aromatic herbs dried and reduced to powder; they were formerly made into little balls with sweet water, and strung together, or worn loose in the pocket.

di-a-pâ-gôn, di-a-pâge, s. [Lat. diapason=an octave; Gr. diapason=a concord of the first and last notes of an octave; a contraction for diapason chordon symphonia=concord extending through all the notes: diâ=through, and pâson=all, genit. plur. fem. of pas=all.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: In the same sense as II. 1.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Harmony, concord, accord, agreement.

(2) Completion, usefulness.

(3) A combination or union of various sounds.

II. Music:

*1. An octave.

2. The name given to the most important foundation stops of an organ, termed more properly Principal. There are two kinds of diapasons, the open and stopped. Open diapasons on the manual are nearly always of metal, but on the pedals are often of wood. Stopped diapasons were formerly, in most cases, of wood, but now are frequently made of metal. When two or more open diapasons are on the same manual they are of different scales.

3. Fixed pitch.

† (1) Normal diapason: A recognized standard of pitch. [Pitch.] (Stainer & Barrett.)

(2) Diapason cum diapente:

Mus.: The interval of a twelfth.

(3) Diapason cum diatessaron:

Mus.: The interval of an eleventh.

(4) Diapason ditone:

Mus.: A compound concord, whose terms are in the proportion of ten to four or five to two.

(5) Diapason semiditone:

Mus.: A compound concord, whose terms are in the proportion of twelve to five.

(6) Electric diapason:

Mus.: A tuning fork kept in vibration by electricity.

di-a-pên-si-a, s. [Lat. diapente; Gr. diapente=a fifth in music; so named by Linnaeus, because the flowers are five-cleft.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, the typical one of the sub-order Diapensiaceæ.

di-a-pên-si-â-cê-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. diapensi(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -acæ.]

Bot.: A natural order of dicotyledonous plants, natives of northern Europe and North America. They are prostrate, shrubby plants, with crowded, heath-like, exstipulate leaves and solitary terminal flowers. They are in many respects allied to the Phloxes, from which they differ chiefly in their imbricated bracts, transversely two-celled anthers, and peltate seeds. There are six genera.

di-a-pên-si-â-ds, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. diapensi(a); and pl. suff. -ads.]

Bot.: Same as Diapensiaceæ (q. v.).

di-a-pên-si-ê-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. diapensi(a); Lat. adj. fem. pl. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A sub-order of plants, with anthers debiscent transversely; ovary, three-celled; style, single.

di-a-pên-tê, s. [Gr. diâ=through, and pente=five.]

1. Mus.: The interval of a fifth.

2. Phar.: A mixture of five ingredients.

di-a-pêr, *di-a-per-y, *dy-a-per, s. [French diapré, pa. par. of diaprer=to variegate or diversify with figures; from O. Fr. diapre, diapre=a jasper; O. Ital. diaprio, a corrupt. of Lat. jaspide acc. sing. of jaspis=a jasper; Gr. iaspida, acc. sing. of iaspis=a jasper.] [JASPER.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II. 1.

2. A towel, a napkin.

3. A piece of cloth or napkin wrapped round a child or woman.

II. Technically:

1. Fabric:

* (1) A kind of rich material decorated with raised embroidery.

(2) A linen toweling with a small figure thrown up, as in damask. It is of various widths, ranging from twenty-four to forty-four inches.

2. Her.: The same as DIAPERING (q. v.).

3. Arch.: A panel or flat recessed surface covered with carving or other wrought work in low relief.

diaper-ornament, s.

Arch.: An ornamentation of flowers, applied to a plain surface, either carved or painted; if carved, the flowers are entirely sunk into the work below the general surface; they are usually square, and placed close to each other, and are various in their pattern and design; it was first introduced in the early English style in some of the principal Gothic structures in England. (Weale.)

Diaper-ornament.

diaper-work, s.

Masonry: A pavement checkered by stones or tiles of different colors.

fâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hêre, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, plit, sirê, sir, marine; gô, pôl, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unite, câr, râle, fâll; trý, sýrian. æ, æ = é; ey = â. qu = kw.

di-ā-pēr*, v. t. & i. [DIAPER, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To variegate or embroider; to work in a pattern.

"Over all diapped and written With ladies and with bachelers."
Rosaunt of the Rose, 933, 934.

2. To variegate, to diversify.

"The wanton spring
When she doth diaper the ground with beauties."
Ford: Sun's Darling, iv. 1.

B. Intrans.: To work in embroidery; to embroider.

"If you diaper upon folds, let your work be broken."
Peacham: On Drawing.

di-ā-pēred, di-ā-pred*, dy-ā-pred*, pa. par. or a. [DIAPER, v.]

di-ā-pēr-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DIAPER, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of embroidering, variegating, or ornamenting in diaper.

2. A diaper pattern.

II. Her.: The covering the surface of a shield with an ornament of some kind, independently of the bearings or colors. It is sometimes painted, sometimes in low relief.

di-āph-ā-nal*, di-āph-ā-nall*, a. [English diaphan(e); -al.] The same as DIAPHANOUS (q. v.).

"Being but dark earth, though made diaphanall."

Davies: Witt's Pilgrimage, p. 21.

di-ā-phāne, s. [Fr., from Gr. diaphainō=to show through; dia=through, and phainō=to appear, to show.]

1. Fabric: A woven silk stuff with transparent and colored figures. It is not now used.

2. Anat.: An investing, cortical membrane of a sac or cell.

di-ā-phāned*, a. [Eng. diaphan(e); -ed.] Transparent.

"Drinking of much wine hath the virtue to make bodies diaphaned or transparent."—Trans. of Boccacini (1626), p. 63.

di-ā-phā-nē-ī-tŷ*, s. [Fr. diaphanéité.] The quality of being diaphanous; transparency; the power of transmitting light.

"... apt to grow dry, and shrink, and lose their diaphanetly."—Bay: On the Creation.

di-ā-phān-īc*, a. & s. [Eng. diaphan(e); -ic.]

A. As adj.: Transparent, pellucid; having the power or quality of transmitting light.

"Air is an element superior, and lighter than water, through whose vast, open, subtle, diaphanic, or transparent body, the light afterward created, easily transpired."—Raleigh.

B. As subst.: [DIAPHONICS.]

di-āph-ā-niē, s. The art of imitating stained glass by means of colored translucent pictures or paper.

di-ā-phā-nōm-ō-tēr, s. [Eng. diaphan(e); o connective, and meter.] An instrument for measuring the transparency of the air.

di-ā-phān-ō-scope, s. [Eng. diaphan(e); o connective, and Gr. skopeō=to see.]

Optics: A dark box for exhibiting transparent pictures with or without a lens.

di-ā-phān-ō-type, s. [Eng. diaphan(e); o connective, and type.]

Phot.: Another name for the helenotype, in which a diaphonous or pale positive on a paper rendered translucent by varnish is colored on the back and placed over and in exact correspondence with a duplicate positive of strong character.

di-āph-ān-ōūs, a. [Gr. diaphanēs, from diaphainō=to show through.] Transparent, translucent, clear; having the power or quality of transmitting light.

"Aristotle calleth light a quality inherent, or cleaving to a diaphanous body."—Raleigh.

di-āph-ān-ōūs-lŷ, adv. [Eng. diaphanous; -ly.] Transparently, translucently.

di-ā-phōn-īc, a. [Gr. dia=through, and phōnēō=to sound; phōnē=a sound.] The same as DIA-COUSTIC (q. v.).

di-ā-phōn-īc-āl, a. [English diaphonic; -al.] Diaphonic.

di-ā-phōn-īcs, s. pl. [DIAPHONIC, a.] That branch of science which deals with the properties of refracted sounds; diacoustics.

di-ā-phō-rē-sis, s. [Greek, from diaphorēō=to carry off or through, as a fever by perspiration: dia=through, and phorēō=to carry.]

Med.: An unusual or unnatural degree of perspiration.

di-ā-phō-rēt-īc, a. & s. [Fr. diaphorétique; Lat. diaphoreticus, from Gr. diaphoretikos, from diaphorēsis=perspiration.]

A. As adj.: Having the power or quality of increasing or promoting perspiration.

"A diaphoretic medicine, or a sudorific is something that will promote sweating."—Watts.

B. As substantive:

Pharmacy:

1. A medicine or preparation having the power or quality of increasing or promoting perspiration. A sudorific is more powerful in its effects than a diaphoretic.

2. (Pl.): A class of medicines, also called Sudorifics, acting on the skin and increasing its functions. They are divided into Stimulant sudorifics, which stimulate the vascular system, as ammonia, carbonate, acetate, and citrate of ammonia, camphor, chloroform, ethers, opium, &c.; and Sedative sudorifics, as oxide of antimony, tartarated antimony, and ipecacuanha. Diaphoretics are assisted by the application of warmth, hot vapor to the skin, and warm diluents; and may be used: (1) To restore the action of the skin in cases in which its function has been checked by cold. (2) To determine to the surface in febrile cases, to relieve the system of water and excreta. (3) To keep up an increased action of the surface in skin diseases. (4) To cause the skin to take on an augmented action, and by this means to relieve certain other organs, especially the kidneys. (5) To cause the skin to act vicariously when the action of other secreting organs is excessive, as in diabetes and chronic diarrhoea. (Garrod: Materia Medica.)

"Diaphoretics, or promoters of perspiration, help the organs of digestion, because the attenuation of the aliment makes it perspirable."—Arbuthnot.

di-ā-phō-rēt-īc-āl*, a. [Eng. diaphoretic; -al.] The same as DIAPHORETIC (q. v.).

"It may work upon the mind, as physicians say those kind of diaphoretical medicines do upon the body."—Moutague: Devout Essays (1648), pt. i., p. 60.

di-āph-ōr-īte, s. [Gr. diaphoros=different, and suff. -ite (Min.). (q. v.).]

Min.: The same as ALLAGITE (q. v.).

di-ā-phrāgm (g silent), s. [Fr. diaphragme; Lat. diaphragma, from Gr. diaphragma=(1) a partition, a wall, (2) the midriff; diaphragmyni=to fence off: dia=between, and phragmyni=to fence.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A partition in a chamber, tube, or other object. Flexible diaphragms are used in steam-pressure indicators, faucets, gas-regulators, pumps, &c.

"It consists of a fasciculus of bodies parted into numerous cells by means of diaphragms."—Woodward: On Fossils.

2. In the same sense as II. 1.

"He cut away the ribs, diaphragm, and pericardium of a dog."—Derham: Physico-Theology, bk. iv. ch. vii. (note).

II. Technically:

1. Anat.: An inspiratory muscle, and the sole agent in tranquil respiration. It is the muscular septum between the thorax and abdomen, and is composed of two portions, a greater muscle arising from the ensiform cartilage, and a lesser arising from the bodies of the lumbar vertebrae by two tendons. There are three openings in the diaphragm, one for the passage of the inferior vena cava, one for the passage of the oesophagus and pneumo-gastric nerves and the aortic, through which passes the aorta, the right vena azygos, and thoracic duct. It assists the abdominal muscles, which are expiratory, powerfully in expulsion, each act of that kind being accompanied or preceded by a deep inspiration. It also comes into play in hicough and sobbing, laughing and crying, sometimes causing hernia, or rupture of the viscera.

2. Optics: An annular disc in a camera or telescope or other optical instrument, to exclude some of the marginal rays of a beam of light. The original form of this beautiful contrivance is the iris of the eye, which shuts out strong light and regulates the quantity admitted. The use of the iris was known to Leonardo da Vinci.

3. Conchol.: The straight calcareous plate which divides the cavity of certain shells into two parts.

diaphragm faucet, s. One which closes its aperture by the depression of the diaphragm upon the end of a pipe by means of a screw-plunger.

diaphragm-plate, s. A plate beneath the stage of a compound microscope, to restrict the amount of light reflected from the mirror. The plate has a number of holes of varying sizes, either of which may be brought to bear.

diaphragm-pump, s. A pump in which a disc-piston is attached by an elastic diaphragm, usually of leather, to the sides of the barrel. It was described by Desaguliers, in 1744, as "a piston without friction." It is much older than the time of this philosopher, however. It has been again and again re-invented, and brought out with a flourish of trumpets, [BAG-PUMP.] Its application may have been suggested by the human diaphragm.

di-ā-phrāg-māt-īc, a. [Gr. diaphragma (genit. diaphragmatos), and Eng. adj. suff. -ic.]

Anat.: Of or pertaining to the diaphragm; as, diaphragmatic nerve, &c.

di-ā-phrāg-ma-tī-tis, s. [Greek diaphragma (genit. diaphragmatos), and Eng. suff. -itis (Med.).]

Med.: Inflammation of the diaphragm or of its peritoneal coats.

di-ā-ph-thōr-āl-ma, s. [Greek diaphtheirō=to destroy, and haima=blood.]

Med.: A generic term for blood contaminated, poisoned, or corrupted by any cause, so as to terminate fatally, if this result be not averted by medical treatment or by the efforts of nature.

di-ā-ph-ŷ-sis, s. [Gr. diaphysis=a growing through, a bursting of a bud; diaphyō=to grow through: dia=through, and phyō=to grow.]

I. Ord. Lang.: A growing between, an intestine.

II. Technically:

1. Botany:

(1) An abnormal extension of the center of a flower, or of an inflorescence.

(2) The nodi of grasses.

(3) The interstices or portions of the culm between the nodi of grasses.

2. Anat.: The central portion of the long bones, from which the process of ossification commences, proceeding toward a secondary center, epiphysis, situated at each extremity.

di-ā-plās-tic, s. [Gr. diaplastikos=good at molding or forming; diaplassō=to mold, to set a limb.]

Med.: A medicine or preparation used in the treatment of fractured or dislocated limbs.

di-āp-nōt-īc, s. [Gr. diapnoē=evaporation.]

Med.: A remedy which operates by promoting a gentle or imperceptible perspiration.

di-āp-ō-phŷs-īc-āl, a. [Eng. diapophys(is); -ical.] Of or pertaining to a diapophysis (q. v.).

di-ā-pōph-ŷs-is, s. [Greek dia=through, and apophysis=a growing, a growth.]

Anat.: The dorsal or tubercular portion of the transverse process of a vertebra.

di-ā-pō-rē-sis, s. [Gr. diaporeō=to be in doubt.] Rhet.: Doubt, or hesitation, as to which of two subjects to begin with.

di-ā-prŷ*, a. [Eng. diaper; -y.] Variegated, adorned, flowered.

"They lay neerer the diapry verges Of tear-bridge Tigris swallow-swifter verges."

Sylvester: The Colonies, 428. (Davies.)

di-ā-r-chŷ*, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and archō=to rule.] A form of government in which the supreme power is in the hands of two persons.

di-ār-ī-āl*, di-ār-ī-an*, a. [Eng. diary; -al, -ian.]

Of or pertaining to a diary or journal.

"Diarian sages greet their brother sage."

Crabbe: Newspaper.

di-ā-r-ist, s. [Eng. diar(y); -ist.] One who keeps a diary or journal.

di-ār-rhō-ā, s. [Lat., from Gr. diarrhoia=a flowing through; diarrhō=to flow through: dia=through, and rhō=to flow.]

Med.: The excessive discharge of fluid alvine evacuations, generally arising from unwholesome diet, excess in food or drink, cold, wet, fatigue, or exposure, or from functional derangements of the biliary or gastro-intestinal organs; it is a chief symptom in cholera. There are three forms of idiopathic diarrhoea: (1) Diarrhoea of irritation; (2) congestion or inflammatory diarrhoea; (3) diarrhoea with discharges of unaltered ingesta.

"During his diarrhoea I healed up the fontanels."—Wiseman.

di-ār-rhō-tic, di-ār-rhē-tic, a. [English diarrhoea, and adj. suff. -etic.] Causing or tending to cause diarrhoea.

"Millet is diarrhetic, cleansing, and useful in diseases of the kidneys."—Arbuthnot.

di-ār-thrō-dī-āl, a. [Eng. diarthros(is); -ial.]

Anat.: Of or pertaining to diarthrosis; having free motion in the articulations of the joints.

diarthrodial cartilage, s.

Anat.: One which invests the articular extremities of bones.

di-ār-thrō-sis, s. [Greek, from diarthrō=to divide by joints: dia=between, asunder, and arthrō=to joint, to fasten; arthron=a joint.]

Anat.: A movable articulation, the most common of all the joint-movements of the body. This class is divided into three genera: Arthrodia, carpal and tarsal bones; Ginglymas, elbow, wrist, knee, ankle; and Enarthrosis, hip and shoulder.

bōll, bōy; pōūt, jōwl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist, ph = f.
-cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

dī-a-rŷ, s. & a. [Lat. diarium = (1) a daily allowance of food for a soldier, (2) a diary; dies=a day; Ital. diario.]

A. As subst.: An account of the transactions or occurrences of each day; a book in which the events of each day are registered; an almanac or calendar with blank spaces for notes, memoranda, &c.; a journal.

"Samuel Pepys, whose library and diary have kept his name fresh to our time."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iv.

B. As adj.: Daily; lasting but a day.

"The offer of a usurpation, though it was but as a diary agree."—Bacon: Letters, 83. (Trench: On some Def. in our Eng. Diet., p. 21.)

dī-a-schism, dī-a-schis-mā, s. [Gr. diaschisma=a division; diastichō=to cleave.]

Music: An approximate half of a limma (q. v.).

dī-a-spōre, s. [Gr. diaspora=a scattering; diastērō=to scatter; in allusion to the usual decrepitation before the blow-pipe.]

Min.: An orthorhombic, massive, or sometimes stalactitic mineral of various colors, white to violet or plum-blue. It is very brittle and subtranslucent or translucent when thin. In a closed tube it decrepitates strongly, separating into pearly white scales. It is commonly found with corundum or emery in dolomite, chlorite schist, and other crystalline rocks. It occurs in the Urals, Switzerland, Asia Minor, and elsewhere. Hardness, 6½-7; specific gravity 3.3-3.5. (Dana.)

dī-a-stāl-tic, a. [Gr. diastaltikos=able to distinguish.]

Music: Dilated or extended; a term applied in Greek music to certain intervals, as a major third, major sixth, or major seventh.

dī-a-stāge, *dī-ās-tā-sis, s. [Gr.=a separation; dia=between, apart, and stasis=a standing, a position; sta, root of histēmi=to stand.]

1. Surg. (of the form diastasis): A forcible separation of two bones previously in contact, or of the pieces of a fractured bone.

2. Chem. (of the form diastase): A peculiar nitrogenous substance produced during the malting of grain. Its effect is to act upon the starch of the grain, converting part of it into sugar and rendering it soluble.

dī-ās-tā-tite, s. [Gr. diastatos=split up, disturbed, and Eng., &c., suff. -ite (q. v.).]

Min.: A black hornblende, from Nordmark, in Wernland. It is placed by Dana under his division, Aluminous Amphibole.

dī-a-stēm, dī-a-stē-mē, s. [Gr. diastēma, from diastēnai, infin. of diastēmi=to separate, to stand at intervals.] [DIASTASIS.]

1. Music (of the form diastem): An interval.

2. Zool. (of the form diastema): The intervals between a series or range of teeth.

dī-ās-tōl-ē, *dī-ās-tōl-ŷ, s. [Gr. diastolē=a drawing apart; dia=apart, and stellō=to send, to place.]

I. Ordinary Language and Technically:

1. Gram.: The lengthening of a syllable which is naturally short; the figure by which a syllable naturally short is made long.

2. Med.: A dilatation of the heart and arteries. (Opposed to systole q. v.)

"The systole seems to resemble the forcible bending of a spring, and the diastole its flying out again to its natural state."—Ray: On the Creation.

3. Phys.: The pulse.

II. Fig.: A lengthening, a drawing out, a protruding.

"As in long-drawn systole and long-drawn diastole, must the period of faith alternate with the period of Denial."—Carlyle: Sartor Resartus, bk. ii, ch. iii.

dī-ās-tōl-ic, a. [Eng. diastol(e); -ic.] Pertaining to diastole, or the dilatation of the heart and arteries.

diastolic sound, s.

Phys.: The second sound of the heart, heard after the first sound, systolic (q. v.), which is coincident with the shock of the heart's apex forward against the side. Diastolic, the second sound, is synchronous with the diastole of the ventricles, the recedence of the heart from the side, and the pulseless state, or systole, of the large arteries; because of maximum loudness at the upper part of the heart it is sometimes called the superior sound.

dī-ās-tō-pōr-a, s. [Gr. diasto, in compos.=opened, put asunder, from diastellō=to put asunder, to open, and poros=a passage.]

Zool.: A genus of Polyzoa, or Bryozoa, the typical one of the family Diastoporidæ. The encrusting conœcium is discoidal, and more or less eccentric in its mode of growth.

dī-ās-tō-pōr-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. diastopora, and fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool. & Paleont.: A genus of Polyzoa, or Bryozoa (two names for the same class). The tubular cells are not free in any part of their length. It ranges from the Silurian period till now.

dī-a-stylē, s. [Greek diastylon=the space between columns; dia=between, and stylos=a pillar.] Arch.: An arrangement of columns in Grecian and Roman architecture, in which the intercolumniation or space between them is equal to three or four diameters of the shaft.

dī-a-sŷrm, s. [Greek diasyrmos=a tearing in pieces, mockery; diasyrō=to tear in pieces, to mock.]

Rhet.: A figure of speech expressing mockery and contempt, or by which reproach is conveyed in an ironical manner.

dī-a-tēs-sa-rōn, s. [Gr. dia=between, through, apart, and tessara=four.]

1. Music: An interval of a fourth; its proportion is as four to three, being composed of a greater tone, a lesser tone, and a greater semitone.

2. Bib.: A harmony of the four Gospels.

3. Med.: A medicine or preparation compounded of gentian, Aristolochia rotunda, bayberries, and honey, incorporated with extract of juniper.

dī-a-thēr-māl, a. [Gr. dia=through, and thermainō=to heat; thermos=heat.] Through which heat can freely permeate.

dī-a-thēr-man-ŷ, s. [Greek diathermainō=to heat through; dia=through, and thermainō=to heat; thermos=heat.] The quality of being diathermal; the property of transmitting radiating heat.

dī-a-thēr-ma-nē-i-tŷ, s. [Gr. diathermainō.] The same as DIATHERMANCY (q. v.).

dī-a-thēr-man-ism, s. [Gr. diathermainō, and Eng. suff. -ism.] The doctrine or phenomena of the transmission of radiant heat.

dī-a-thēr-man-ōs, a. [Gr. diathermainō.] The same as DIATHERMAL (q. v.).

"A rough surface is more likely to cause increased emission of heat in the case of bodies that are very slightly diathermanous, in which therefore the total radiation is confined to a very small depth below the surface."—London Academy.

dī-a-thēr-mic, a. [Greek dia=through, and thermos=heat.] Transmitting heat; allowing heat to pass through.

dī-a-thēr-mōm-ē-tēr, s. [Gr. dia=through, and Eng., &c., thermometer.] An instrument for measuring the thermal resistance of a substance by noting the amount of heat which it transmits.

dī-āth-ē-sis, s. [Greek, from diatithēmi=to place, to arrange.]

Med.: A certain natural state or constitution of body, by which a person is predisposed to certain particular diseases.

"There are medicines of which the effect is to correct the lithic diathesis, as it is called."—Watson: Lectures on Physic, lect. xxvi.

dī-a-thŷ-ræ, s. [Gr. diathŷra.]

Arch.: The vestibule before the room of a Greek house, corresponding with the prothyra of the Romans.

dī-a-tōm, s. [DIATOMA.]

Botany:

1. Strictly: A member of the genus Diatoma (q. v.).

2. Loosely: A member of the order Diatomaceæ (q. v.). [DIATOMACEAN.]

diatom-prism, s.

Optics: A triangular prism used for illuminating small objects in the field by oblique light.

dī-āt-ōm-a, s. [Gr. diatomē=a cutting through; dia=through, and tomē=... a cutting, temnō=to cut.]

Bot.: A genus of Algae, the typical one of the order Diatomaceæ. The frustules are in the front view linear, sometimes curveate, at first united with flat filaments, but afterward separating so as to remain connected by the generally alternate angles only, thus forming a zigzag chain. About nine species are known. (Griffith & Henfrey, &c.)

dī-a-tō-mā-ŷ-a, s. pl. [DIATOMACEÆ.]

Bot.: "The silicious coverings of a large group of microscopic low vegetable organisms." (Huxley.) The group to which he refers constitutes Lindley's order, Diatomaceæ (q. v.).

dī-a-tō-mā-ŷ-a, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. diatom(a), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -acæe.]

1. Bot.: Brittleworts. An order of flowerless plants, alliance Algae. The species are crystalline fragmentary bodies, generally bounded by right lines, or more rarely by curved lines, flat, stiff, brittle, usually nestling in slime, uniting into various forms, and then separating again. They occur on the surface of stones constantly moistened by water, on the glass of hot-houses, on the face of rocks in the sea, or of walls where the sun never shines, or the hard paths in damp parts of gardens after rain. They multiply either by division or by conjugation. Many of these have been mistaken for animals, the erroneous belief that they are so having been kept up by the spontaneous movement seen in some of their frustules. Lindley divides the order into three sub-orders: (1) Cymbellæ, (2) Hydrinellæ, and (3) Desmidiæ (q. v.). (Lindley, &c.)

2. Paleo-botany: Diatomaceæ occur fossil in such great abundance that they form hills, rocks, and such minerals as tripoli. Many of the species were formerly classed as animals, and ranked with the Infusoria.

dī-a-tō-mā-ŷ-a-n, s. [Lat. diatomaceæ (q. v.). and Eng. suff. -an.]

Bot.: A member of the order Diatomaceæ.

dī-a-tōm-ic, a. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and Eng. atomic (Chem.) (q. v.).]

Chem.: Dyad. A term given to an element which is incapable of directly combining with only two atoms of monatomic (monad) element; as with two atoms of hydrogen, chlorine, &c. [ATOMICITY.] Oxygen is a diatomic (dyad) element; it has its atomicity represented by two bonds; thus —O—; or by two dashes, as O".

diatomic acid, s.

Chem.: An organic acid derived from a diatomic alcohol. (Only primary alcohols can yield acids.) The acid is said to be monobasic, if one of the primary alcohol radicals (CH₂OH) is converted into an acid radical (COOH); if both primary alcohol radicals are converted into acid radicals then the acid is dibasic. Thus the diatomic alcohol glycol CH₂OH can yield the monobasic acid COOH glycolic acid, and the dibasic acid COOH oxalic acid.

diatomic alcohol, s.

Chem.: An alcohol derived from a hydro-carbon by the replacement of two atoms of hydrogen, respectively, by the monad radical (OH) hydroxyl. [GLYCOLS.]

dī-āt-ō-mōs, a. [Greek diatomē=a cutting through, and Eng. adj. suff. -ous.]

Min.: Having crystals with one distinct diagonal cleavage.

dī-āt-ō-nī, s. pl. [Gr. diatonos.]

Arch.: Angle-stones in a wall, wrought on two faces, and projecting between the general face of the wall. According to Vitruvius, the girders or band-stones formerly employed in constructing walls; corner-stones.

dī-a-tōn-ic, a. [Gr. diatonikos; diatonos, from diatēinō=to stretch.]

1. Greek Mus.: One of the three genera of music among the Greeks; the other two being the chromatic and the enharmonic.

II. Modern Music:

1. The major and minor scales.

2. Chords, intervals, and melodic progressions, &c., belonging to one key-scale.

diatonic chord, s.

Music: A chord having no note chromatically altered.

diatonic interval, s.

Music: An interval formed by two notes of a diatonic scale unaltered by accidentals.

diatonic melody, s.

Music: A melody not including notes belonging to more than one scale.

diatonic modulation, s.

Music: A modulation by which a key is changed to another closely related to it. (Stainer & Barrett.)

dī-a-tōn-ī-cal-ly, adv. [Eng. diatonic; -ally.] In a diatonic manner.

Diatomaceæ.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, there; plne, plt, sire, slr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
ous = shūs. -ble. -dle. &c. = bel. del.

bóil, boy; pòut, jowl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shǔn; -tìon, -sìon = zhǔn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

dī-cāc'-l-tŷ, s. [Lat. dicacitas, from dicar.]

1. Talkativeness, fluency.

"To remit the freedom of inquiry after it for their dicacity."—Byron: Enthusiasm (Introd.).

2. Sauciness, pertness.

"This gave a sort of petulant dicacity to his repartees."—Graves: Spiritual Quixote, i. 2.

dī-cā-ōl'-ō-gŷ, s. [Gr. dikaos=just, and logos=a discourse.]

Rhet.: A figure of speech by which an orator endeavors to move an audience in his favor.

dī-car'-bōn-ate, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and Eng. carbonate (q. v.).]

Chem.: A term applied to a carbonate containing one atom of carbonic acid with two of the element with which it is combined.

dīc'-ast, s. [Gr. dikastēs=a judge, or rather = juror; dikē=justice.]

Greek Antiq.: A juror.

dīc'-ās-tēr-ŷ, s. [Gr. dikastērion.]

Greek Antiq.: A court of justice.

dīce, dees, dīs, dies, dyse, s. pl. [DIE (2), s.]

1. [DIE, s.]

2. A game played with dice.

dice-box, s. The box or cylindrical case out of which dice are thrown.

"When the bottle or the dice-box was going round."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

dice-coal, s. The layers in a coal-seam of a glossy bituminous nature, which break up into cubical pieces.

dīce, dycyn, v. i. & t. [DICE, s.]

A. Intrans.: To play at dice, to gamble.

"The Dick Talbot who had diced and revelled with Grammont."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvii.

B. Transitive:

1. To sew a kind of waved or zigzag pattern round the edge of a dress.

2. To ornament with squares or diamonds by pressure. [DICING.]

*3. To cut up in cubes or squares.

"Dycyn, as men do brede, or other lyke. Quadro."—Prompt. Parv.

dī-cēn'-tra, s. [Gr. dikentros=with two stings: dis=twice, twofold, and kentros=a sting.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, order Fumariaceæ, tribe Fumariæ. Dicentra cucullaria has been employed as a medicine to expel intestinal worms, and as an emmenagogue. It is a tree growing in Brazil and Guiana.

dī-cēph'-a-loūs, a. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold and kephalē=a head.] Having two heads on one body; two-headed.

dī-cēr, dī-cour, dī-sar, dy-sar, s. [Eng. dice (e); -er.] One who plays at dice; a gambler.

"As false as dicer's oaths."—Shakesp.: Hamlet, iii. 4.

dī-cēr-ās, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and Gr. keras=a horn.]

Paleont.: A genus of massive bivalves of the Middle Oolites, belonging to the family Chamidæ Diceras.

A. Right Valve.

B. Left Valve.

or Clam-shells. The shell is sub-equivalve, attached by either ambo; beaks very prominent, spiral, furrowed externally by ligamental grooves; hinge very thick; teeth 2-1, prominent. The beaks are twisted backward like rams' horns. (Woodward, &c.)

diceras limestone, s.

Geol.: A division of the Oolite in the Alps, in which the shells of the genus Diceras occur in great abundance.

dīch (1), dīchen, v. t. [DIKE, v. DITCH.]

1. To dig.

2. To surround with a ditch.

"The whiche tounne the queene Symyramus Leet dichen al about."—Chaucer: Leg. Good Women; Tesbe, 3.

dīch (2), v. i. [A corruption of do't=do it.] May it do.

"Much good dīch thy good heart, Apemantus."

Shakesp.: Timon of Athens, i. 2.

¶ Though this has the appearance of being a familiar and colloquial form, it has not been met with elsewhere. . . . Nor is it known to be provincial. (Nares.)

dī-chāls, dī-chals, s. [Gael. diocla.] A reproof, a correction, a beating.

dī-chās-tā-sis, s. [Gr. dichazō=to part asunder; dicha=in two parts, apart.] Spontaneous subdivision.

dī-chās-tic, a. [DICHASTASIS.] Capable of spontaneous subdivision.

dī-chē-lēs-tī-dā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. dichelestium, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idae.]

Zool.: A family of Entomotracheans, order Parastida. The anterior segment has four antennæ, one pair of which is filiform, the others stout and furnished with a prehensile claw.

dī-chē-lēs-tī-ūm, s. [Gr. dichē=in two ways, and lēstēs=a robber (?).]

Zool.: The typical genus of the family Dichelestidae (q. v.). The species are parasitic upon fishes, &c.

dī-chens, s. pl. [Prob. connected with dichæls (q. v.).] A beating; a correction.

"They'll get their dichens for 't some day."—Brownie of Bodsbeck, ii. 127.

dī-chlām-ŷd'-ō-ūs, a. [Pref. di=twice, twofold; Gr. chlāmys=a cloak, and Eng. adj. suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Having two coverings, a corolla and a calyx.

dī-chlōr'-, dī-chlōr'-ō-, in compos. [Pref. di=twice, and Eng., &c., chloro (q. v.).]

Chem.: Applied to compounds in which two atoms of chlorine have replaced two atoms of hydrogen; as dichloroacetic acid.

dichloroacetic acid, s. [CHLOROACETIC ACID.]

dī-chlōr-hŷ-drin, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and Eng., &c., chlorhydrin (q. v.).]

Inorganic Chemistry: $C_2H_5(OH)_2Cl_2$. Dichlorhydrin exists in two modifications: (1) Symmetrical, $CH_2Cl \cdot CH(OH) \cdot CH_2Cl$. Obtained by saturating equal volumes of glycerine and glacial acetic acid with hydrochloric acid gas at 100°, neutralizing with sodium carbonate, and fractionating the resulting $CH_2Cl \cdot CH_2Cl$, oil; or by shaking epichlorhydrin, with concentrated hydrochloric acid. It is an ethereal-smelling liquid, boiling at 172°. Slightly soluble in water, easily soluble in alcohol and ether.

Heated with hydriodic acid, HI, it is converted into isopropyl iodide; by sodium amalgam into isopropyl alcohol. By oxidation with chromic acid mixture it is oxidized into chloroacetic acid and beta dichloroacetone, $CHCl \cdot CO \cdot CHCl$. (2) Unsymmetrical, $CH_2Cl \cdot CHCl \cdot CH_2(OH)$. Obtained by the addition of chlorine to allyl alcohol, or of hypochlorous acid to allyl chloride, $CH_2=CH \cdot CH_2Cl$. It is a liquid, boiling at 182°; is converted into allyl alcohol by sodium, and by fuming nitric acid it is oxidized into dichloro-propionic acid.

dī-chlōr'-ide, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and Eng., &c., chloride (q. v.).]

Chemistry: A compound of two atoms of chlorine with an element or radical, as ethylene dichloride, $C_2H_4 \cdot Cl_2$. Dichlorides are often called bichlorides (q. v.).

dī-chō-bū-ne, s. [Gr. dicha=in two parts, apart, and bounos=a height, a ridge.]

Paleont.: A genus of quadrupeds belonging to the family Anoplotheriidae, and found in the Middle Eocene formations. They form a kind of transition between the Swine and the true Ruminants. They are so called from the ridges in the upper molars.

dī-chō-dōn, s. [Gr. dicha=two parts, apart, and odon (genit. odontos)=a tooth.]

Paleont.: A genus of artiodactyle Mammals, found in the Middle Tertiary formations in Hampshire, England, and so called from the double crescent-shaped lines of enamel on the upper surface of the true molars. They are closely allied to the Dichobune (q. v.).

dī-chōg'-a-mōūs, a. [Eng. dichogam (y); -ous.]

Bot.: Characterized by dichogamy.

dī-chōg'-a-mŷ, s. [Gr. dicha=in two parts, apart, and gamos=a marriage.]

Bot.: A provision in hermaphrodite flowers to prevent self-fertilization, the stamens and pistils within the same flower not being matured at the same time.

dī-chō-grāp-sūs, s. [Gr. dicha=apart, asunder, and Mod. Lat. grapsus, a modification of graptolite (q. v.).]

Paleont.: A genus of Fossil Hydrozoa, belonging to the sub-class Graptolitiæ (Graptolites). There are more than four (usually eight) simple monoprionidial branches, arising from the same number of divisions of a non-celluliferous basal process.

dī-chōn-dra, s. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and chondros=corn, grain, in allusion to the form of the capsules.]

Bot.: A genus of Convolvulaceæ, tribe Dichondrea, of which it is the type.

dī-chōn-drē-ō, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. dichondra (a), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -œ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Convolvulaceæ, characterized by having the carpels distinct instead of consolidated.

dī-chord, s. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. chord (q. v.).]

Musical:

1. An instrument having two strings.

2. An instrument having two strings to each note.

dī-chōt'-ōm-ic, a. [Eng. dichotom (y); -ic.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Branching off or dividing into two parts, heads, or divisions; double.

"The Scriptural representation is as often dichotomic as it is trichotomic."—British Quarterly Review, vol. lvii., p. 301 (1873).

2. Bot.: The same as DICHOTOMOUS (q. v.).

dī-chōt'-ō-mist, s. [Eng. dichotom (y); -ist.] One who dichotomizes or divides things into two.

"He that will be a flat dichotomist

Is in your judgment thought a learned man."

Marlowe: Massacre at Paris, i. 1.

dī-chōt'-ō-mīze, v. t. & i. [Gr. dichotomēō, from dicha=in two, apart, and tomē=a cutting; temnō=to cut.]

A. Trans.: To cut into two parts; to divide or break up into pairs.

"That great city might well be dichotomized into cloisters and hospitals."—Bishop Hall: Epist., i. 5.

B. Intrans.: To separate into two parts.

dī-chōt'-ō-mīzed, pa. par. & a. [DICHOTOMIZE.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

Astron.: Half illuminated. An astronomical term, used especially with regard to the moon.

"This is a Greek expression, used to denote that state of the moon when it is dichotomized."—Prof. Airy: Pop. Astronomy (6th ed.), p. 167.

dī-chōt'-ō-mōūs, a. [Gr. dichotomōs=cut or divided into two parts or divisions.]

Bot.: Branching or dividing into two or pairs.

"The divisions in this case always take place by two, or in a dichotomous manner."—Balfour: Botany, § 338.

dichotomous-corymbed, a.

Bot.: Composed of corymbs in which the pedicles are dichotomous.

dī-chōt'-ō-mōūs-lŷ, adv. [Eng. dichotomous; -ly.] In a dichotomous manner.

dī-chōt'-ō-mŷ, dī-chōt'-ō-mīe, s. [Fr. dichotomie; Gr. dichotomia=a division into two parts or heads.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A dividing or division; a separation.

"A general breach of dichotomy with their church."—Brownie.

2. A distribution or division into pairs.

"Whosoever doth not apply fall within those dichotomies."—Bacon: On Learning, bk. vi., ch. ii., § 1.

II. Technically:

1. Logic: A distribution or separation of ideas by pairs; the division of a class into two sub-classes opposed to each other by contradiction.

"Some persons have . . . abused their readers by an affectation of dichotomies, trichotomies, sevens, twelves, &c."—Watts: Logic.

2. Bot.: A term applied to that kind of branching by a constant furcation or division into two parts, as where the stem of a plant branches into two branchlets, each of which in its turn divides into others, and so on. Example, the mistletoe. The veins of various ferns thus branch dichotomously.

3. Astron.: That phase of the moon where it appears bisected or is only half illuminated, as at the quadratures.

dī-chrō'-ic, a. [Greek dichroos=of two colors.] The same as DICHROITIC (q. v.).

dī-chrō'-ism, s. [Greek dichroia=double color, from dis=twice, twofold; chroa, chroia=color, and Eng. suff. -ism.]

Optics: The property by which a crystallized body assumes two or more colors, according to the direction by which light is transmitted through it. Examples, iolite, mica, muriate of palladium, &c. Dichroism depends upon the absorption of some of the colored rays of the polarized light in its passage through the crystal, this absorption varying fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mātē, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

with the different relative positions of the planes of primitive polarization of these rays to the axis of double refraction of the crystals, so that the two pencils formed by double refraction are differently colored.

di-chrō-ite, s. [Gr. dichroos=of two colors, and Eng. suff. -ite (Min.) (q. v.).]
Min.: The same as LOLITE (q. v.).

di-chrō-it-ic, a. [Gr. dichroos=of two colors.] Characterized by dichroism; exhibiting dichroism.

"In fact the agent, whatever it is, which sends us the light of the sky, exercises in so doing a dichroitic action."—Tyndall: Frag. of Science (3d ed.), ch. vii., pp. 141, 142.

di-chrō-mate, s. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. chromate (q. v.).]
Chem.: A double chromate. Potassium dichromate has the formula $K_2Cr_2O_7$, or $K_2CrO_4 \cdot CrO_3$. [CHROMATE.]

di-chrō-māt-ic, a. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. chromatic (q. v.).] Characterized by or producing two colors.

di-chrō-ōis, a. [Gr. dichroos.] The same as DICHOITIC (q. v.).

di-chrō-scope, s. [Gr. dichroia=double color, and skopeō=to see.]

Optics: An instrument to exhibit the two complementary colors of polarized light. The quality called the dichroism of crystals consists in transmitting different colors when viewed in different directions. There are several varieties of this apparatus invented by Arago and Brewster. As constructed by Brewster, it consists of a tube about two inches long, blackened on the interior, and attached to a ball and socket. The ball contains two prisms of calcareous spar, separated by a film of sulphate of lime, so placed that each pair of the four images is tinged with the complementary colors. A lens is arranged upon or near the prisms either at front or back. On viewing the sky or any luminous object, four brilliantly colored images of the aperture will be seen, the color of the two middle ones being complementary to that of the outer ones. By moving the ball in the socket the colors will constantly change, and the images will sometimes overlap and sometimes separate, exhibiting a great variety of hues pleasing the eye by their combinations, and by the soft harmony of their contrasts. Many beautiful variations may be obtained by using several films of sulphate of lime having their axes variously inclined to one another.

di-chrō-scop-ic, a. [Eng. dichroscop(e); -ic.] Of or pertaining to dichroism, or the use of the dichroscope.

diç-îng, pr. par., a. & s. [DICE, v.]
A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. The act of gambling or playing with dice.
"What comys of dysyng I pray you hark."
Towneley Myst., p. 248.
2. A mode of ornamenting leather in squares or diamonds by pressure, either of a blunt awl or an edging-tool, or in a machine by pressure between dies.

dicing-house, s. A gambling-house; a hell.
"There is such dicing-houses also, they say, as had not been want to be."—Lutwyche: Serm. v.

di-çin-na-mène, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and Eng. cinnamene (q. v.).]

Chem.: $C_{10}H_{16}$, Distyrol, distyrolene. A hydrocarbon formed by heating cinnamene, C_8H_8 , with hydrochloric acid to 170°. It is an oily liquid.

dic, s. [A corruption of Richard.] Apparently, a worthless fellow.

"O, he, sir, he's a desperate dic, indeed. Bar him your house."—London Prodigal, i. 2.

dic-ëng, interj. [Prob. a corruption of devilkins or devils.] The devil, the deuce.

"I cannot tell what the *dic*kins his name is."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, lii. 2.

dic-ër, s. [L. Ger. & Sw. deker; Ger. decker=ten hides or skins; Low Lat. dacra, decara, from Lat. decuria=the number of ten; decem=ten.] [DAKER.] A number or quantity of ten of any commodity, as a decker of hides or skins=ten hides or skins; a bundle.

"Behold," said Pas, 'a whole dicker of wit.'"—Sidney's Arcadia.

dic-ër, v. t. & i. [Prob. from DICKER, s.]

A. Trans.: To barter, to exchange, to deal in.

B. Intrans.: To barter, to chaffer, to haggle, to drive a bargain.

"I had acquired quite a reputation in *dic*king with the thievish Italian landlors and vetturini."—Headley: Letters from Italy (1849), p. 99.

dic-ër (1), dic-ër (1), s. [Perhaps from Dut. dekken, Ger. decken=to cover; A. S. theccan=to thatch, to cover; Icel. thekja; Dan. dække.] [THATCH, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A child's pinafore or bib; a leathern apron.
2. A linen shirt-front.

II. Vehicles: A seat behind the body of a carriage for servants. In the old-fashioned English stage-coach it was occupied by the guard and some passengers.

"Mr. Bob Sawyer was seated, not in the dickey, but on the roof of the chaise."—Dickens: Pickwick, ch. 1.

dic-ër (2), dic-ër (2), s. [A dimin. from Richard.] An ass, a donkey.

"Time to begin the dickey races, More afraid for laughter than for speed."

Bloomfield: Richard and Kate. (Davies.)

dickey-bird, s. A pet name for a little bird.
"The dear little dickey-birds carol away!"
Barham: Knight and Lady.

dickey-daisy, s.
Bot.: Bellis perennis.

† Large dickey-daisy: Chrysanthemum leucanthemum.

dickey-delver, s.
Bot.: Vinca major or minor.

dic-ës-ni-a, s. [Named after Mr. James Dickson, an eminent cryptogamic botanist.]

Bot.: A genus of Polypodiaceæ, the type of the section Dicksoniæ. The species are mostly arborescent ferns from the Southern Hemisphere. The tree-fern of St. Helena is Dicksonia arborescens. It has more than once been brought to this country, but has never thrived well. Other species of the genus have also been introduced. Of these D. antarctica is very beautiful, and is often seen in greenhouses.

dic-ës-ni-ë, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. dicksonia, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ë.]

Bot.: A tribe of Polypodiaceæ.

dic-ër, a. [Ety. doubtful.] Not in a perfectly sound or safe state; doubtful, questionable. [Slang.]

"It [meat] couldn't do any one much harm if it was ever so *dic*ky."—London Daily Telegraph.

di-clë-gi-üm, s. [Gr. diktis=folding two ways.]

Bot.: A small, dry, indehiscent pericarp, having the indurated perianth adherent to the carpel, and forming part of the shell, as in Marvel of Peru.

di-clin-äte, di-clin-ic, a. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and klinō=to bend, to incline.]

Crystallog.: A term applied to crystals in which two of the axes are obliquely inclined, as in the oblique rectangular prism.

di-clin-ōis, a. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and klinō=to bend, to incline.]

1. Bot.: A term given to plants which have the stamens in one flower and the pistils in another.

2. Crystallog.: The same as DICLINIC (q. v.).

di-clip-tër-g, s. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold; kleiō=to shut, and pteron=a wing. So named because the fruit is two-valved.]

Bot.: A genus of Acanthaceæ, tribe Diclipteræ, of which it is the type. The sepals are five, the corolla two-lipped, its tube twisted, the stamens two. About seventy species are known from the tropics of both hemispheres.

di-clip-tër-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. diclipter (a), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family or tribe of Acanthaceæ.

di-cōc-cōis, a. [Gr. dikkokkos, from dis=twice, twofold, and kokkos=a berry.]

Bot.: Two-grained; consisting of two cohering grains or cells, with one seed in each.

di-cōc-loüs, a. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and koilos=hollow.] Having two cavities. Used chiefly of the heart in animals.

di-cōn-ic, a. [Greek dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. (a) conic (q. v.).]

Chem.: A term occurring only in the following compound:

diconic acid, s.

Chem.: $C_8H_{10}O_8$. Obtained by heating citric acid to 190° to 200° with concentrated hydrochloric acid. At 140° acetic acid is formed, along with a syrupy variety of citric acid called dicitric acid; on further heating the mixture diconic acid is formed; also by heating acetic acid with fuming hydrochloric acid. It crystallizes in small crystals, which melt at 200°, and are soluble in water, alcohol, and ether. [Watts: Dict. Chem.] di-cōt-ÿ-lë-dōn (pl. di-cōt-ÿ-lë-dōng, di-cōt-ÿ-lë-dōn-ëg, s. [Gr. pref. dis=twice, and kotyledōn=any cup-shaped hollow or cavity.]

Botany:

1. (Sing.): A plant having two cotyledons or seed-leaves, that is, primordial leaves, contained in the embryo. The majority of flowering plants have this structure. When therefore seed is sown, in most cases the future plant first appears above the ground as a tiny two-leaved existence, and in certain cases the next pair of leaves which appear, and all the future ones, are of a different structure from the first. The primordial pair of leaves are the two cotyledons. Their use in the economy of nature is to shelter the ordinary leaves situated inside.

2. (Pl.): The highest class of the vegetable kingdom, containing orders of plants with the structure of seed described under 1. It is a natural division and has other characteristics than that now mentioned; specially, new wood is added to the old externally, whence these plants are very often termed Exogens (q. v.). The Dicotyledons comprise at least two-thirds of all known plants.

di-cōt-ÿ-lë-dōn-ōis, a. [Mod. Lat., &c., dicotyledon, and Eng., &c., suff. -ous.]

Bot.: Having two cotyledons; pertaining to the class Dicotyledones.

di-cōt-ÿ-lë-g, s. [Gr. dis=twice, and kotylë=a cavity.] [PECCARY.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Swine [SCIDÆ (q. v.)], familiarly known as Peccaries, confined to the American continent and ranging from Paraguay as far north as Texas and Arkansas. The Dicotyles differ from other swine in the number and shape of the teeth, in having only three toes on each hind foot, and in possessing a glandular opening in the loins, secreting a fetid humor; for the rest they are not unlike small pigs, either in appearance or habits, and are gregarious, generally occurring in small flocks. Two species of Peccary are known—the Common, or Collared Peccary (Dicotyles torquatus), and the White-Lipped Peccary (D. labiatus). The latter, which is the larger and more ferocious of the two, is confined to the forests of South America.

di-crân-ä-gë-s, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. dicran (um), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -acæ.]

Bot.: A family of apocarpous operculate Mosses, branching by innovations, or with the tops of the fertile branches several times divided. The leaves are lanceolate or subulate; cells prosenchymatous, rarely papillose; capsule oval or cylindrical, arched or straight.

di-crân-öç-ër-üs, s. [Greek dikranos=two-headed, forked, and keras=a horn.]

Zoöl.: A genus of quadrupeds belonging to the Antelope family, in which the horns are greatly compressed, rough, with an anterior process; tail very short, facial line convex; structure cervine.

di-crân-ö-gräp-süs, s. [Gr. dikranos=two-headed, forked, and Mod. Lat. grapus=a modif. of graptolite (q. v.).]

Faun.: A genus of fossil Hydrozoa, belonging to the sub-class Graptolitidæ (Graptolites); exclusively Lower Silurian. Polypary is at first diprionid, but soon splits into two monopronid branches, which carry the cellules along their outer margins. [Nicholson.]

di-crä-nüm, s. [Gr. dikranos=two-headed, forked.]

Bot.: A genus of Mosses, the typical one of the family Dicranaceæ.

di-cröt-ic, a. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold; and krotëō=to make to rattle, to knock, to strike; krotos=a striking or rattling together.]

Pathol.: An epithet applied to the pulse, when the artery, when felt, conveys the sensation of a double pulsation.

di-cröt-ism, s. [From the same elements as dicrotic (q. v.), and Eng. suff. -ism.]

Physiol.: The double beating of the pulse.

di-cröt-ōis, a. [Gr. dikrotos.]

Med.: Beating twice as fast as usual (applied to the pulse).

di-cröt-üm, s. [Gr. dikrotos=double-beating pace, with two ranks of oars; dis=twice, twofold, and krotëō=to make, to rattle, to strike.] A boat with two oars, or with two banks of oars on each side.

di-crür-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. dicrur (us), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ornith.: A family of Dentirotal birds, order Passeres, which by its founder, G. R. Gray, was classed with the family Ampelede. The Dicruridæ (King-crows or Drongo-shrikes) resemble the Flycatchers (Muscicapidæ), to which they are allied, especially in having the nostrils entirely hidden by bristles. They have, however, only ten tail-feathers. The feet are essentially constructed for grasping, which, with the lengthened tail, renders walking difficult. All the species feed on insects, which they capture on the wing, returning again immediately to the perch they have just quitted or some adjoining place of rest. The members of this family range through the Ethiopian and Indian regions and the Austro-Papuan, including the Moluccas.

böll, böy; pöüt, jöw!; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, ag; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph=f.
-cian, -tian=shan. -tion, -sion=shün; -tjon, -gion=zhün. -tious, -cious, -sious=shüs. -ble, -dle, &c.=bël, dël.

di-crū-ri-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. dicur(us), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ina.] Ornith.: A sub-family of the Dicuridae (q. v.).

di-crū-rūs, di-crū-rūs, s. [Gr. dikroos = forked, and oura = a tail.]

Ornith.: A genus of birds, the typical one of the sub-family Dicurinae. There are several species, among which may be named the Dicurus macrocerus, the King of the Crows, of Bengal, and D. muscivorus, whose notes have been compared to those of the thrush and nightingale.

dict, s. [Lat. dictum.] A saying.

"The old dict was true after all."—C. Reade: Cloister and Hearth, ch. xxxvi.

dic-ta, s. pl. [DICTUM.]

dic-tā-mēn, s. [Low Lat., from dicto = to dictate; Fr. dictamen = inward consciousness.] A dictate, a precept, an injunction.

"The dictamens of a higher understanding."—Lord Falkland, in Hammond's Works, vol. ii., pt. i., p. 600.

dic-tā-mēt, s. [Low Lat. dictamen, from dicto = to dictate.] A dictate.

"If any followed . . . the dictamens of right reason."—Sir K. Digby: Observ. on Browne's Religio Medici.

dic-tamne, s. [DICTAMNUS.] The herb dittany (q. v.).

"Whilst I seek for dictamne to recure his scarre."—Strling: Aurora, st. 6.

dic-tām-nē-a, s. pl. [Lat. dictamn(us), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]
Bot.: A tribe of Rutaceæ.

dic-tām-nūs, s. [Lat., from Gr. diktamnos = dittany, from Mount Dictæ in Crete, where the plant grows in great abundance.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, belonging to the order Rutaceæ, and found in Southern Europe, Asia Minor, &c. Dictamnus Fragrāns, False Dittany, abounds in volatile oil to such a degree that the atmosphere around it becomes inflammable in hot, dry, and calm weather. [DIT-TANY.]

Dictamnus, Root, Leaf and Blossom.

dic-tā-te, v. t.

& i. [Lat. dictatus, pa. par. of dicto = to dictate, a frequent from dico = to say; Fr. dicter; Sp. dicar; Ital. diccare, diccare.]

A. Transitive:

*1. To say frequently, to repeat.

"Such, and not nobler, in the realms above,
 My wonder dictates is the dome of Jove."

Pope: Homer's Odyssey, iv. 89, 90.

2. To tell, deliver, or declare to another with authority; to state, prescribe, or deliver as a command, order, or direction.

"Whatsoever is dictated to us by God himself must be believed with full assurance."—Watts.

3. To repeat or declare to a subordinate words to be written or repeated by another.

"... pages dictated by the Holy Spirit."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

4. To lay down the terms or conditions of; to impose.

"She had dictated treaties."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

*5. To instigate, to urge, to encourage.

"Or led by hopes, or dictated from heaven."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, vi. 557

6. To suggest, to prompt, to instigate.

"... attached to the policy which had dictated the Triple Alliance."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

B. Intransitive:

1. To give orders, to propose or impose terms.

"... who presumed to dictate to the sovereign."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

2. To utter words to be written or repeated by another.

"Sylla could not skill of letters, and therefore knew not how to dictate."—Bacon: Advancement of Learning, I. vii. 29.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to dictate and to prescribe: "To dictate amounts even to more than to command; it signifies commanding with a tone of unwarrantable authority, or still oftener a species of commanding by those who have no right to command; it is therefore mostly taken in a bad sense. To prescribe partakes altogether of the nature of counsel, and nothing of command; it serves as a rule to the person prescribed, and is justified by the superior wisdom and knowledge of the person prescribing; it is therefore always taken in an indifferent or a good sense. He who dictates speaks with an adventitious authority; he who prescribes has the sanction of reason. To dictate implies an entire subservience in the person dictated to: to prescribe carries its own weight with it in the nature of the thing prescribed." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dic-tā-te, s. [Lat. dictatum, neut. sing. of dictatus, pa. par. of dicto = to dictate; Sp. & Port. dictado; Ital. diccato, diccato.]

1. An order, command, injunction, or prescription.

"My sons! the dictates of your sire fulfill."

Pope: Homer's Odyssey, iii. 531.

2. A suggestion, rule, or direction of the mind.

"How slow to learn the dictates of His love."

Cooper: Epistle to a Lady in France.

*3. A precept, rule, or maxim.

"I credit what the Grecian dictates say."—Prior.

¶ Dictates of Hildebrand, Dictate of Hildebrand: Literature & Ch. Hist.: Twenty-six short propositions relating to the supremacy of the Roman pontiffs over the whole church, as well as over states. (Murdoch.)

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between dictate and suggestion: "The dictate comes from the conscience, the reason, or the passion; suggestions spring from the mind, the will, or the desire. Dictate is taken either in a good or bad sense: suggestion mostly in a bad sense. It is the part of a Christian at all times to listen to the dictates of conscience: it is the characteristic of a weak mind to follow the suggestions of envy. A man renounces the character of a rational being who yields to the dictates of passion: whoever does not resist the suggestions of his own evil mind is very far gone in corruption, and never will be able to bear up long against temptation. Dictate is employed only for what passes inwardly; suggestion may be used for any action on the mind by external objects. No man will err essentially in the ordinary affairs of life who is guided by the dictates of plain sense. It is the lot of sinful mortals to be drawn to evil by the suggestions of Satan, as well as their own evil inclinations." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dic-tāt-ēd, pa. par. or a. [DICTATE, v.]

dic-tāt-ing, pr. par. & a. s. [DICTATE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of ordering, commanding, or suggesting; dictation.

dic-tā-tion, s. & a. [Lat. dictatio, from dictatus, pa. par. of dicto = to dictate.]

A. As substantive:

1. The act of dictating, ordering, or enjoining.

"A nature on which dictation and contradiction acted as philtres."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

2. The act of giving out verbally words to be written or repeated by another.

"Giving from dictation common words which illustrate the same or analogous forms and combinations."—Fearon: School Inspection (1876), p. 37.

3. Words or a passage written out after the dictation of another.

B. As adj.: Dictated, given from dictation; as, dictation exercise.

dic-tā-tōr, dic-ta-tour, s. [Lat., from dicto = to dictate; Fr. dicteur.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. One who dictates, orders, or commands; one who is invested with supreme power.

"Their great dictator, whose attempt

At first against mankind so well had thrived."

Milton: P. R., i. 113, 114.

2. One who has authority to determine or decide on any point or question.

"Did they appeal to St. Peter, as the supreme dictator and judge of controversies?"—Barrow: On the Pope's Supremacy.

II. Rom. Antiq.: A magistrate created in times of great emergency, distress, or danger, and invested, during the term of his office, with absolute and unlimited power. The name given to this magistrate was originally Magister Populi, but subsequently he was styled Dictator, a name already familiar to the Latin States. The office was probably first created in B. C. 501, and the first Dictator was Titus Larcus. The Dictator was nominated by one of the Consuls in pursuance of a decree of the Senate, whence the name, from the technical phrase, Dicere dictatorem. The nominator performed his duty at dead of night. Originally only one who had held the office of Consul could be named Dictator, but subsequently the office was thrown open to all, the first plebeian Dictator being C. Marcius Rutilus, in B. C. 356. The Dictator was named for six months only, but he seldom retained the office after the object for which he had been appointed was fulfilled. The office was abolished by law after the death of Cæsar.

"Without a dictator she would probably have succumbed to a powerful foe in some moment of weakness."—Lewis: Cred. Early Roman Hist. (1855), ch. xii., pt. i., § 13.

dic-tā-tō-ri-al, a. [Eng. dictator; -ial.]

1. Of or pertaining to a dictator; absolute, unlimited, uncontrolled.

"... entrusted with dictatorial power in the hour of peril."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

2. Imperious, overbearing, dogmatical.

"A young academic often dwells upon a journal in a dictatorial style, and is lavish in the praise of the author."—Watts.

dic-tā-tō-ri-al-ly, adv. [Eng. dictatorial; -ly.] In a dictatorial, imperious, or dogmatical manner.

dic-tā-tō-ri-an, a. [Lat. dictatorius.] Dictatorial, absolute, unlimited.

"You will have a dictatorial power over all times and laws past."—State Trials; Col. Litburne (an. 1649).

dic-tā-tōr-ship, s. [Eng. dictator; -ship.]

I. Literally:

1. The office of a dictator.

"A still stronger proof was his laying down the dictatorship."—Langhorne: Plutarch; Sylla.

2. The period during which a dictator held office.

II. Figuratively:

1. Supreme or absolute authority or power.

"This being a kind of dictatorship."—Wotton.

*2. Imperious or dogmatic conduct or assertion.

"This is that perpetual dictatorship which is exercised by Lucetius."—Dryden.

dic-tā-tōr-y, a. [Lat. dictatorius.] Dictatorial, dogmatical.

"Our English will not easily find servile letters snow to spell such a dictatory presumption."—Milton: Areopagitica.

dic-tā-trēss (Eng.), dic-tā-trix (Lat.), s. [Lat. dictatrix.] A female dictator; a woman who gives orders or lays down rules dogmatically and imperiously.

"Earth's chief dictatress, ocean's mighty queen."

Byron: English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.

dic-tāt-ūre, s. [Fr., from Lat. dictatura.]

1. The office of a dictator; dictatorship.

2. Supreme authority.

"The very same authors, who have usurped a kind of dictature in sciences."—Bacon: On Learning (Pref.), p. 9.

dic-tōr-y, s. [Fr. dicter = to dictate.] A saying, a maxim.

"I did heap up all the dicteries I could against women, but now recant."—Burton: Anat. of Melancholy, p. 584. (Davies.)

dic-tion, s. [Fr., from Lat. dictio, from dico = to speak.]

*1. A word.

"Two sondrie wordes, albeit by reason of the figure called Synalephe it seemeth no more but one diction."—Udall: Apophthegm, of Erasmus, p. 13 (ed. 1576).

*2. The act of speaking of, naming, or describing.

"To make true diction of him, his semblable is his mirror."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, v. 2.

3. Style; manner of expressing one's self in writing or speaking; language.

"Mr. Trenchard and Dr. Davenant were political writers of great abilities in dictation."—Goldsmith: The Bee, No. viii.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between diction, style, phrase, and phraseology: "Dictation expresses much less than style: the former is applicable to the first efforts of learners in composition; the latter only to the original productions of a matured mind. Errors in grammar, false construction, a confused disposition of words, or an improper application of them, constitute bad dictation: but the niceties, the elegancies, the peculiarities and the beauties of composition, which mark the genius and talent of the writer, are what is comprehended under the name of style. . . . As dictation is a term of inferior import, it is of course mostly confined to ordinary subjects, and style to the productions of authors. We should speak of a person's dictation in his private correspondence, but of his style in his literary works. Dictation requires only to be pure and neat; style may likewise be neat, elegant, florid, poetic, sober, and the like. Dictation is said mostly in regard of what is written; phrase and phraseology are said as often of what is spoken as of what is written. He has adopted a strange phrase or phraseology: the former respects single words, the latter comprehends a succession of phrases." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fāl; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

*dic-tion-ā-ri-an, s. [Eng. dictionary; -an.] A compiler of a dictionary, a lexicographer.

*dic-tion-ā-ry, s. & a. [Fr. dictionnaire; Sp. diccionario; Ital. dizionario, from Low Lat. dictionarium, from Lat. dictio=a saying.]

A. As substantive:

1. A word-book; a book containing the words of any language in alphabetical order, with their definitions; a vocabulary. In addition to the definition, most dictionaries give also the pronunciation, etymology, and various spellings of each word, and frequently add to these quotations from authors, illustrating the several uses or shades of meaning of each, and giving in some cases engravings or diagrams of the objects defined or described.

"Dictionary writing was at that time much in fashion."—Goldsmith: On Polite Learning, ch. iii.

2. A work intended to furnish information on any subject, branch of science, &c., under words or heads arranged alphabetically; as, a dictionary of medicine, a dictionary of biography, &c.

B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to a dictionary; contained or given in a dictionary.

"The late dictionary explanations of it . . . are mere guesses."—F. J. Furnivall, in Notes and Queries, Nov. 4, 1882.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between dictionary and encyclopedia: "The definition of words, with their various changes, modifications, uses, acceptations, and applications, are the proper subjects of a dictionary; the nature and property of things, with their construction, uses, powers, &c., are the proper subjects of an encyclopedia. A general acquaintance with all arts and sciences as far as respects the use of technical terms, and a perfect acquaintance with the classical writers in the language, are essential for the composition of a dictionary; an entire acquaintance with all the minutiae of every art and science is requisite for the composition of an encyclopedia. A single individual may qualify himself for the task of writing a dictionary; but the universality and diversity of knowledge contained in an encyclopedia render it necessarily the work of many. A dictionary has been extended in its application to any work alphabetically arranged, as biographical, medical, botanical dictionaries, and the like, but still preserving this distinction, that the dictionary always contains only a general or partial illustration of the subject proposed, while the encyclopedia embraces the whole circuit of science."

(2) He thus discriminates between dictionary, lexicon, vocabulary, glossary, and nomenclature: "Lexicon is a species of dictionary appropriately applied to the dead languages. A Greek or Hebrew lexicon is distinguished from a dictionary of the French or English. A vocabulary is a partial kind of dictionary which may comprehend a simple list of words, with or without explanation, arranged in order or otherwise. A glossary is an explanatory vocabulary, which commonly serves to explain the obsolete terms employed in any old author. A nomenclature is properly a list of names, and in particular reference to proper names." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

"Of course if Bengali dictionary-makers or pandits would only let us see that language as it really is, . . ."—Beames: Comp. Gram.

¶ This word is occasionally used in a contemptuous sense, implying a mere compiler. (Compare BOOKMAKER, 1.)

*dic-tit-āte, v. t. [Lat. dictito, freq. of dico=to say.] To say or repeat frequently.

*dic-tōur, s. [Prov. dictayre, dictador, from Lat. dictator.] A ruler, judge, or guardian.
"Mordred . . . salue be thy dictour."
Morte Arthure, 709.

dic-tūm, s. [Lat., neut. sing. of dictus, pa. par. of dico=to say.]

1. A positive or dogmatic assertion.
"There are Anglo-Saxon communities where this dictum may have a meaning counterpart."—London Standard.

*2. The award, sentence, or arbitrament of an arbitrator.

dic-tū-ō-lites, s. [Gr. diktyon=a net, and lithos=a stone.]

Palæont.: A genus of fossil Fucoids found in the Upper Silurian rocks.

dic-tyd-i-um, s. [Gr. diktydion, dimin. of diktyon=a net.]

Bot.: A genus of Myxogastres (Gasteromycetous Fungi). They are exceedingly elegant little plants, growing upon rotten wood. When the spores are expelled the transparent case appears like a cage, formed of the veins alone.

dic-ty-ō-gēn, s. [Gr. diktyon=a net, and gennaō=to produce.]

Bot.: A member of the sub-class Dictyogena (q. v.).

dic-ty-ōg-ēn-æ, s. pl. [Dictyogen.]

Bot.: A sub-class of monocotyledonous plants with leaves reticulated, often articulated with the stem; branches with the usual structure of Endogens, but the rhizomes or underground stems have the woody matter disposed in a compact circle, or in wedges containing central cellular tissue, and often showing medullary processes. It comprises three orders, Dioscoreaceae, or Yam tribe; Smilacaceae, or the Sarsaparilla family; and Trilliaceae, or the Trillium family.

dic-ty-ōg-ēn-ous, a. [Eng. dictyogen; -ous.]

Bot.: Having or presenting the characteristics or features of a Dictyogen; an epithet applied to certain monocotyledonous plants, the leaves of which present a reticulated appearance.

dic-ty-ōn-ē-ma, s. [Gr. diktyon=a net.]

Palæont.: A genus of fossil Hydrozoa, having a frond branched and plant-like, and fan-shaped or funnel-shaped in form. It has no footstalk. The branches radiate from the base, running nearly parallel with each other, and often bifurcating. The genus ranges from the Upper Cambrian to the Middle Devonian. (Nicholson.)

dic-ty-ōph-yl-lum, s. [Gr. diktyon=a net, and phylon=a leaf.]

Bot.: A provisional genus erected for the reception of all unknown fossil dicotyledonous plants which exhibit the common reticulated structure. Dictyophylla have been found as low as the Trias and Permian. (Page.)

dic-ty-ōp-ter-a, s. pl. [Gr. diktyon=a fishing-net, and ptera, pl. of pteron=. . . a wing.]

Entom.: A sub-order of Orthoptera. It was introduced by Burmeister. The larvæ and pupæ closely resemble the perfect insect. It contains the Blattidæ or Cockroaches, in some other classifications arranged as Blattina, a tribe of the order Orthoptera.

dic-ty-ōp-ter-is, s. [Gr. diktyon=a net, and pteris=a kind of fern.]

Palæo-botany: A genus of culmiferous ferns established by Guttier for those forms possessing the general habit of Neuropteris, but differing from it in having a somewhat radiate-reticulate venation, and no distinct midrib. (Page.)

dic-ty-ōp-ty-gē, s. [Gr. diktyon=a net, and pugē=the anus.]

Palæont.: A genus of Ganoid fishes from the Triassic coal-fields of Virginia, and so named by Sir P. Egerton from the net-like appearance of the large anal fin. The scales are smc'ch rhomboidal, the tail heterocercal, and the fins broad and flowing. The species vary from four to six or eight inches in length.

dic-ty-ō-ta, s. [Greek diktyōtos=made in net fashion.]

Bot.: A genus of Algae, the typical one of the family Dictyotidæ (q. v.).

dic-ty-ō-tē-æ, s. pl. [Gr. diktyōtos=net-like, reticulated; dictyōo=to weave like a net; diktyon=a net.]

Bot.: An order of Algæ, with dark seeds, superficial spores, or cysts, arranged in spots or lines, fronds flat or thread-like.

dic-ty-ō-ti-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. dictyot(a), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of Algae, order Fucaceae, tribe Halysereæ. The frond is continuous, membranous; the vesicles supported by floccs collected in heaps or scattered over the upper surface of the frond. (Lindley.) [DICTYOTÆ.]

di-cy-ān, di-cy-an-ō, in compos. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and cyan-, cyano- (c. v.).]

Chem.: Compounds in which the radical cyanogen (CN) is contained twice, having replaced two atoms of hydrogen, chlorine, &c.

dic-yano-diamide, s.

Chem.: Param, C₂N₄H₄, or HN=C<NH>C=NH.

A polymeride of cyanamide. It is obtained by heating cyanamide to 150°, or by boiling it with water, or with aqueous alkalis. It crystallizes out of water or alcohol in plates, which melt at 206°; it is insoluble in ether. When heated strongly it gives off NH₃, and leaves a yellow residue of meta-mine, C₃H₃N₃. By boiling dicyanodiamide with baryta-water, amido-di-isocyanic acid is formed, which crystallizes in needles, and by warming with sulphuric acid is converted into biuret.

dic-yano-diamidine, s.

Chem.: A compound which contains the monad radical $\text{C} \begin{smallmatrix} \text{NH} \\ \diagup \end{smallmatrix} \begin{smallmatrix} \text{NH} \\ \diagdown \end{smallmatrix}$ in which the hydrogen atoms can be replaced by hydrocarbon radicals. They are obtained by the action of ammonia, or amines, on imide chlorides, and on thio-amides. Also by heating nitrils with the hydrochlorates of ammonia, or of amines. Dicyano-diamidine (C₂N₄H₄O, or HN=C<NH>CO-NH₂) is a base formed by the action of dilute acids on dicyano-diamide; or by fusing a salt of guanidine, HN=C<NH>NH₂ with urea, CO<NH>NH₂, ammonia being also formed, and washing the fused substance with water, and precipitating the dicyano-diamidine with cupric sulphate, the rose-colored precipitate is decomposed by H₂S. The free base is strongly alkaline; its crystals absorb CO₂ from the air. It forms crystalline salts. When the sulphate is boiled with excess of baryta-water it evolves ammonia, and the filtered solution on evaporation yields urea.

di-cy-a-nide, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and Eng. &c., cyanide (q. v.).]

Chem.: A compound which contains the radical cyanogen (CN) twice, the (CN) being united to another element, or dyad radical, as Hg(CN)₂, mercuric dicyanide. The prefix di is often omitted in the case of metallic cyanides, the atomicity of the metal indicating the number of (CN) contained in it.

di-cyñ-ō-dōn, s. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold; kyōn=a dog, and odous (genit. odontos)=a tooth.]

Palæont.: A genus of fossil reptiles, occurring in a sandstone, supposed to be of Triassic age, in Southern Africa and India. The principal remains yet found, the bones of the head, indicate a gigantic type between the Lizards and Turtles. The anterior portions of the jaws appear to have been altogether toothless, and they form a kind of beak, which was probably sheathed in horn. The lower jaw has no teeth; but each superior maxilla carries an enormous tusk-like tooth, growing from a persistent pulp. Eye orbits very large, cranium flat, with nostrils divided as in Lizards. Order, Anomodontia.

di-cyñ-ō-dōn-ti-a (ti as shi), s. pl. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold; kyōn=a dog; odous (genit. odontos)=a tooth, and Lat. adj. pl. suff. -ia.]

Zool.: In Prof. Owen's classification, the first family of Anomodontia, the fifth order of the class Reptilia, or Reptiles. (Prof. Owen: Palæontology, 1860.) Prof. Huxley makes the Dicynodontia an order equivalent to Prof. Owen's Anomodontia. They have long canine fangs, projecting downward from the upper jaw, whence their name. Genera, Dicynodon, Oudenodon, and perhaps Rhynchosauros, which last, however, Prof. Huxley considers to belong to the Lacertilia.

di-cy-pēl-li-um, s. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and dimin. of kypellon=a goblet, a cup.]

Bot.: A genus of Lauraceæ. The bark of Dicypellium caryophyllum is the clove cassia of Brazil.

di-cy-s-tid-ē-a, s. pl. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and kystis=a bladder.]

Zool.: An order of Protozoa, akin to the Gregarinida.

did, pret. of v. [Do.]

1. As the simple pret. of the verb to do.

"He did it unconstrained."
Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I., l. 1.

2. As a substituted verb.

" . . . and prayed and gave thanks before his God as he did aforetime."—Dan. vi. 10.

3. As auxiliary of the past tense.

"The mountain did burn with fire."—Deut. v. 23.

4. Used to convey emphasis.

¶ Did is the only surviving instance in English of the oldest mode of indicating past time—viz., by reduplication, as commonly found in Greek and occasionally in Latin. In O. Eng. the suffix of the pret. of weak verbs was de, in Goth. and O. S. da; thus in O. Eng. the pret. of do was di-de, in A. S. dyde, in O. S. deda. In Mod. Eng. the suffix of the pret. of weak verbs is ed, e is a connecting vowel, and d a contracted form of did; thus we loved really represents we love did, or as we now say, we did love. [Do, -ED.]

di-dāc-tic, di-dāc-tic-al, a. & s. [Gr. didaktikos, from didaskō=to teach; cogn. with Lat. doceo; Fr. didactique.]

A. As adj. (of both forms): Adapted or tending to teach or convey instruction; containing precepts, rules, or doctrines.

"Didactic poetry openly expresses its intention of conveying knowledge or instruction."—Blair: Lect. xl.

*B. As subst. (of the form didactic):

1. (Sing.): A treatise on education.

2. (Pl.): The art or science of teaching.

di-dāc-tic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. didactical; -ly.]

In a didactic manner, so as to convey instruction.
"Points best resolved by the books of the Fathers, written dogmatically or didactically."—Ep. Andrewes: Answer to Cardinal Perron, p. 50.

bōll, boy; pōut, jowl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tīon, -gion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

dī-dāc'-tīcs, s. pl. [DIDACTIC.]

dī-dāc'-tīl, dī-dāc'-tīle, a. & s. [Fr. didactyle, from Gr. didaktulos: dis=twice, twofold, and duktulos=a finger.]

A. As adj.: Having only two toes or fingers.

B. As subst.: An animal which has only two toes. dī-dāc'-tīl-ōus, a. [Gr. didaktulos.] Having two fingers or toes; didactyle.

dī-dall, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A kind of triangular spade used for cutting and banking up ditches.

"A sickle to cut with, a didall and crome,
For draining of ditches, that noies thee at home."
Tusser: Husbandry, xvii. 19.

dīd'-āp-pēr, dyd-op-per, dive-dap-per, s. [A contraction of dive, and dapper or dopper=one who dips or dives.]

Ornith.: The little Grebe or Dabchick, Podiceps minor.

dīd'-dās-cāl-ar, dī-dās-cāl'-ic, dī-dās-cāl'-ick, a. [Gr. didaskalikos, from didaskō=to teach.] Didactic, preceptive.

"Whether didascalick or heroic, I leave to the judgment of the critics."—Prior: Solomon (Pref.).

dīd'-dēr, dyd-der, dyd-er-in, v. i. [Etym. doubtful. Cf. Ger. zittern=to tremble.] To shiver as with cold. [DADE, DADIB, DOTE.]

"Diddering and shivering his chaps."—Crquhart: Roberts, bk. iii., ch. xx.

didder-grass, s. Briza media.

dīd'-dēr-ing, dyd-er-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DIDDER.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: A shivering or shaking as with cold. "Dyderinge. Frigitus."—Prompt. Parv.

dīd'-dle, v. i. & t. [Perhaps a freq. of dade (q. v.). A. S. dyderian=to deceive; originally, probably, to deceive by rapid motions. (Wedgwood.)]

A. Intransitive:

1. To totter, to walk unsteadily, as a child.

"To see him diddle up and down the room!"
Quarles: Divine Fancies, i. 4.

2. To jog; to move backward and forward.

B. Transitive:

1. To move rapidly backward and forward; to jog. "In his profession he had right good luck
At bridals his elbow to diddle."
A. Scott: Poems (1811), p. 34.

2. To cheat.

dīd'-dle, s. [DIDDLE, v.] A jangle of music.

"In their ears it is a diddle,
Like the sounding of a fiddle."
Train: Poet. Rev.

diddle-daddle, s. Nonsense.

"Let us have done now with all this diddle-daddle."—Mad. D'Arbly's Diary, i. 108. (Davies.)

dīd'-dle-dōm, dīd'-dle-dōme, s. [Eng. diddle; -dom.] A trifle; kickshaws.

"Feede him with a dish of diddledomen."—Breton: Dreams of Strange Effects, p. 17. (Davies.)

dīd'-dlēr, s. [Eng. diddl(e); -er.] A cheat, a swindle.

dī-dēc-a-hē-drāl, a. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. decade (q. v.).]

Crystall.: Having the form of a decahedral prism, with pentahedral summits.

dī-dēl-phī-a, s. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and delphe=a womb.]

Zool.: One of the three primary divisions into which the class Mammalia is divided, when the structure of the reproductive organs is taken as a basis for classification; the other two being the Ornithodelphia (Monotremata) and the Monodelphia. Didelphia comprises the Marsupialia (q. v.), or those non-placental Mammals in which the uterine dilations of the oviducts continue distinct throughout life, opening into two separate vaginæ, which in turn open into a urogenital canal, distinct from the rectum, though embraced by the same sphincter muscle. The young of this sub-class are born imperfect, or, as it were, prematurely, and are carried in the pouch or second womb till perfect.

dī-dēl-phī-an, a. [Mod. Lat. Didelphi(a), and Eng. adj. suff. -an.] Of or belonging to the Didelphia (q. v.).

dī-dēl-phīc, a. [Mod. Lat. Didelphi(a), and Eng. adj. suff. -ic.] The same as DIDELPHIAN (q. v.).

dī-dēl-phīd, q. & s. [Mod. Lat. Didelphi(a), and Eng. adj. suff. -id.]

A. As adj.: The same as DIDELPHIAN (q. v.).

B. As subst.: A member of the group Didelphia (q. v.).

dī-dēl-phī-dē, a. [Mod. Lat. Didelphi(a), and Eng. adj. suff. -dē.] The same as DIDELPHIAN (q. v.).

dī-dēl-phī-dē, a. [Mod. Lat. Didelphi(a), and Eng. adj. suff. -dē.] The same as DIDELPHIAN (q. v.).

dī-dēl-phī-dē, a. [Mod. Lat. Didelphi(a), and Eng. adj. suff. -dē.] The same as DIDELPHIAN (q. v.).

dī-dēl-phī-dē, a. [Mod. Lat. Didelphi(a), and Eng. adj. suff. -dē.] The same as DIDELPHIAN (q. v.).

dī-dēl-phī-dē, a. [Mod. Lat. Didelphi(a), and Eng. adj. suff. -dē.] The same as DIDELPHIAN (q. v.).

dī-dēl-phī-dē, a. [Mod. Lat. Didelphi(a), and Eng. adj. suff. -dē.] The same as DIDELPHIAN (q. v.).

dī-dēl-phī-dē, a. [Mod. Lat. Didelphi(a), and Eng. adj. suff. -dē.] The same as DIDELPHIAN (q. v.).

dī-dēl-phī-dē, a. [Mod. Lat. Didelphi(a), and Eng. adj. suff. -dē.] The same as DIDELPHIAN (q. v.).

dī-dēl-phī-dē, a. [Mod. Lat. Didelphi(a), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ide.]

1. Zool.: One of the families of the order Marsupialia, and the only one found out of Australia. The Didelphide or Opossums inhabit North and South America, are arboreal in their habits, and carnivorous, feeding upon small quadrupeds and birds; but they will also eat insects and even fruit. The great toe of the hind foot has no nail, and is opposable to the other toes, enabling the creature to grasp; the tail also is prehensile. The marsupium or pouch in some species is but slightly developed. Their dentition is remarkable for the number of incisors.

2. Palæont.: Remains of a small Opossum, Dryolestes, referable to the Didelphide, have been found in beds of Upper Jurassic age in North America. Species closely resembling existing forms are met with in the Eocene Tertiaries of the Paris Basin; while the Post-Pliocene deposits of this country yield the bones of existing genera.

dī-dēl-phīc, a. [DIDELPHIC.]

dī-dēl-phīc, s. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and delphe=a womb.]

1. Zool.: A genus of Opossums (Didelphide) (q. v.). These animals are confined to the American continents, and are arboreal and nocturnal in their habits. They are carnivorous, preying upon small quadrupeds and birds, but will also eat insects and even fruit. One species, Didelphys carnirova, subsists chiefly on crabs. The marsupial pouch is not always present, and in D. dorsigera is merely represented by folds of the skin concealing the nipples. The female of this species carries her young about on her back while they cling to her by twining their tails around hers.

2. Palæont.: Remains of Didelphys are found in the Post-Pliocene deposits of America.

dī-dēl-phīc, s. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and delphe=a skin.]

Bot.: A genus of Gasteromycetous Fungi, consisting of minute epiphytic plants. The peculiar character resides in the double layer of the peridium, the outer being smooth and crust-like, fragile and dehiscient, while the inner is very delicate and evanescent.

dī-dī-dē, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. didus, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ide.]

Ornith.: A family of birds, of which Didus is the type.

dī-dī-dē, a. [Mod. Lat. didus, and Eng. adj. suff. -ine.] Of or pertaining to the Didus (q. v.).

dī-dī-dē, v. i. [Etym. doubtful.] To dabble, to dregge.

"To diddle in their mud for pearl-muscles."—W. Taylor: Holbert's Memoirs (1808), i. 471. (Davies.)

dī-dō-dēc-a-hē-drāl, a. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. dodecahedron (q. v.).]

Crystall.: Having the form of a dodecahedral prism, with hexahedral summits.

dī-drāchm (ch silent), dī-drāch-mā, s. [Gr. didrachmon=a double drachma (q. v.).]

Greek Numis.: A coin, the fourth part of an ounce of silver.

"A didrachm, the fourth part of an ounce of silver, which was the tribute."—Bishop Taylor: Life of Christ, iii. § 14.

dī-drim'-līte, s. [DIDYMIT.]

didst, 2d pers. sing. past tense of v. [Do.]

dī-dhēc-ment, s. [Lat. diduco=to draw apart; Lat. di=apart; and duco=to draw; Eng. suff. -ment.] The act of dividing or separating into distinct parts.

dī-dūc'-tīon, s. [Lat. diductio, from diduco=to draw apart.] The act of separating by withdrawing one part from the other.

"He ought to show what kind of strings they are, which, though strongly fastened to the inside of the receiver and superficies of the bladder, must draw as forcibly one as another, in comparison of those that within the bladder draw so as to hinder the diduction of its sides."—Boyle.

dī-dūc'-tīve, a. [Lat. diductus], pa. par. of diduco, and Eng. adj. suff. -ive.] Separating or tending to separate; disjunctive.

dī-dūc'-tīve-lī, adv. [Eng. deductive; -ly.] By diduction or deduction.

"Either directly expressed or deductively contained in this work."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. i., ch. viii.

dī-dūn-cū'-lī-dē, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. didunculus, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ide.]

Ornith.: A family of Columbacei (Pigeons), which they connect with the extinct Dodo.

dī-dūn-cū-līs, s. [Lat. dimin. of didus (q. v.).]

Ornith.: The typical genus of the family Didunculidæ. Didunculus strigirostris inhabits the Navigator's Isles.

dī-dūs, s. [Mod. Lat.]

Ornith.: A genus of Rasores, sub-order Columbacei (Pigeons). Didus ineptus is the Dodo (q. v.).

dī-dūs, s. [Mod. Lat.]

dī-dūs, s. [Mod. Lat.]

dī-dūs, s. [Mod. Lat.]

dī-dīm'-līte, s. [Gr. didymos=a twin, and Eng. suff. -ite (Mn.) (q. v.).]

Min.: A schist from the Tyrol, closely approaching Muscovite in its composition. It is a feeble pearly or grayish-white in color. Hardness, 1.5-2; specific gravity, 2.75. (Dana.) Sometimes incorrectly written didymite.

dī-dīm'-lī-ūm, s. [Gr. didymos=a twin.]

1. Chem.: A metallic triad element, symbol Di^{III}, atomic weight 144. It occurs along with cerium (q. v.) and lanthanum in the mineral cerite. It is separated from cerium by igniting the oxalates, and treating the resulting oxides with very dilute nitric acid, which does not dissolve the cerium oxide. The filtered solution is mixed with sulphuric acid, concentrated by evaporation, and then a hot solution of potassium sulphate is added, which precipitates the lanthanum and didymium as double sulphates. Didymium can be separated from lanthanum by precipitating half the oxide with ammonia, and leaving the precipitate in contact with the solution; the lanthanum, being the stronger base, then passes into solution in predominant quantity. By repeating the process, the oxides being again dissolved and precipitated, the didymium oxide is obtained nearly pure. Didymium is a white metal with a tinge of yellow; specific gravity, 6.5. It tarnishes in dry air; it burns with great brilliancy when thrown into a flame. Its oxide, Di₂O₃, is a dirty bluish color; the nitrate is obtained in large violet crystals by dissolving the oxide in nitric acid. The sulphate, Di₂(SO₄)₃·6H₂O, forms rose-red crystals. The oxalate is a crystalline powder. The spectrum of a solution of a salt of didymium contains characteristic dark bands. (Watts: Dict. Chem., &c.)

2. Bot.: A genus of Gasteromycetous Fungi, consisting of minute plants growing upon leaves, bark, rotten wood, &c., distinguished by its double peridium.

dīd-ym-ō-cār'-pē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. didymocarpos], and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: A sub-order of plants belonging to the order Bignoniaceæ. Fruit succulent or capsular, or silique and two-valved; seeds small, ovate, or cylindrical, suspended apterous, sometimes comose.

dīd-ym-ō-cār'-pūs, s. [Gr. didymos=twin, and karpos=fruit.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, the typical one of the sub-order Didymocarpeæ.

dīd-ym-ō-grāp'-sūs, s. [Gr. didymos=twin, and Mod. Lat. grapsus, a modification of graptolite (q. v.).]

Palæont.: The twin Graptolite; a genus of fossil Hydrozoa, belonging to the sub-class Graptolitiidæ (Graptolites), in which the polypary consists of two simple monopropionid branches, springing from a common point. The cells are arranged in single rows, as in the common Graptolite, but the axes are in twines, or two-branched. The genus is commonest in the Upper Cambrian and the Lower Silurian of Wales.

dīd-ym-ō-hē'-līx, s. [Gr. didymos=twin, and hēlix=a fellow, a comrade.]

Bot.: A genus of Confervoid Algae, with the threads consisting of pairs of microscopic, interlacing, spiral filaments. They ordinarily occur in ferruginous bog-water. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

dīd-ym-ōp'-rī-ūm, s. [Gr. didymos=twin, and prion=a saw.]

Bot.: A genus of Desmidiaceæ, differing from Desmidium in having only two processes, and not being angular, and in the number of rays of the endochrome in the side view not depending upon the number of angles. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

dīd-ym-ōus, a. [Gr. didymos=twin.]

Bot.: Twin, growing double. A didymous fruit is composed of two carpels united laterally by their sutures. Example, the fruit in the Galium. A didymous anther is the result of two lobes united by a very short connective, as the anther in the genus Euphorbia.

dīd-ym-ō-nā, s. [DIDYNAMIA.]

Bot.: A didynamous plant.

dīd-ym-ō-nā-mī-ā, s. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, dynamis=power, and Lat. pl. suff. -ia.]

Bot.: In the Linnean system of plants the fourteenth class, consisting of those which have four stamens, two long and two short. It contains two orders, Gymnospermia and Angiospermia (q. v.).

dīd-ym-ō-nā-mī-ān, s. [Lat. didynamia], and Eng. suff. -ian, -ous, -ic.]

Bot.: An epithet applied to a flower containing four stamens, two of which are shorter than the others, as in the Scrophulariaceæ.

"Some flowers are didynamous, having only four out of five stamens developed, and the two corresponding to the upper part of the flower longer than the two lateral ones."—Balfour: Botany, § 419.

die (1), *de, *dee, *deghe, *deghe, *deie, *deien, *deighe, *deigen, *deighen, *dey, *dieghe, *dye, *dyghe, v. i. [From Icel. deyja; cogn. with Sw. dö, Dan. döe, O. Sax. dōian, Goth. dīwan, O. H. Ger. tōwan, M. H. Ger. touwen; all = to die; O. Fris. deia, deja = to kill.]

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

1. To lose life, to expire; to become dead; to leave this world.

¶ It is followed:

(1) By of before the cause of death.

"... have been infected with disease, and have died of it."—Wiseman.

(2) By by before the instrument of death.

"Their young men shall die by the sword; their sons and daughters shall die by famine."—Jer. xi. 22.

(3) By for before the cause of death, when that cause is the privation—expressed or implied—of anything. [C. (1).]

"And loaths the wat'ry glass wherein she gaz'd,
And shuns it still, altho' for thirst she die."—Davies.

2. To depart this life; to meet death.

"There taught us how to live; and (oh, too high
The price for knowledge), taught us how to die."—Tickell: On the Death of Addison.

3. To perish by violence.

"God forbid; thou shalt not die."—1 Sam. xx. 2.

4. To be punished with death; to suffer capital punishment.

"If I die for it, as no less is threatened me, the king, my old master, must be relieved."—Shakep.: King Lear, iii. 3.

5. To lose vegetable life; to wither away, to become dead.

"Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground, and die, it abideth alone."—John xii. 24.

II. Figuratively:

1. To perish, to come to naught, to be lost, to cease to exist.

"This day all quarrels die."—Shakep.: Titus Andronicus, i. 2.

2. To become useless or powerless; to fail.

"His project dies."—Shakep.: Tempest, ii. 1.

3. To lose or be deprived of the principal quality or property; to become useless for any purpose.

"A dying coal."—Shakep.: Venus and Adonis, 338.

4. To become gradually less strong or distinct; to cease or pass away gradually; to vanish; as, The sound died away in the distance.

"When dying clouds contend with growing light."—Shakep.: Henry VI., Pt. III., ii. 5.

5. To pass from memory; to become forgotten.

"Dedes that wolde dete, storry kepeth hem euermore."—Trentia, i. 7.

6. To sink, to faint.

"His heart died within him, and he became as a stone."—1 Sam. xxv. 37.

7. To languish with affection; to pine.

"The young man acknowledged, in love letters, that they died for Rebecca."—Tatler.

8. To lose strength and life; to become vapid and spiritless; (applied to liquors). [DEAD, A. I. 1 (8).]

9. To become indifferent to; to cease to be under the power of; as, To die to the world, To die to sin.

10. To endure great hardship or affliction.

"I die daily."—Cor. xv. 31.

B. Theol.: To perish everlastingly.

"So long as God shall live, so long shall the damned die."—Hakewill: On Providence.

C. Special phrases:

(1) To die for something:

(a) To lose life through something. [DIE I., 1 (8).]

(b) To pine.

"And in despite of all [she] dies for him."—Shakep.: Much Ado about Nothing, iii. 2.

(2) To die away: To become gradually less distinct.

(3) To die out: To become gradually extinct.

(4) To die in the pain: To die in the attempt to do a thing.

"Amongst whom were a v. M. women, wholly bent to revenge the villanies done to their persons by the Romans, or to die in the payne."—Holinshed (1577).

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between to die and to expire: "There are beings, such as trees and plants, which are said to live, although they have not breath: these die, but do not expire. There are other things which absorb and emit air, but do not live: such as the flame of a lamp, which does not die, but it expires. By a natural metaphor, the time of being is put for the life of objects; and hence we speak of the date expiring, and the like: and as life is applied figuratively to moral objects, so may death to objects not having physical life." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between to die and to perish, see PERISH.

die-earth, s.

Min.: A term at Coalbrook Dale, England, for the Wenlock shale, because this stratum lies beneath all the mining-ground of the district, the minerals dying out, as it were, at this stage of descent. (Page.)

*die (2), v. t. [DYE, v.]

*die (1), s. [DYE, s.]

*die (2) (pl. dies, dice, dees, dis, dyse), s. [O. Fr. det, dé (pl. dez) = a die; Prov. dat; Ital. dada (pl. dadi) = a cube, a pedestal; Sp. dado (pl. dados). Low Lat. dadus = a die. Dadus = Lat. datus (sc. talus = a die) = given, pa. par. of do = to give, to throw. (Skeat.)] [DICE.]

A. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

1. In the same sense as B. 2.

"No die, but an ace, for him; for he is but one."—Shakep.: Midsummer Night's Dream, v. 1.

2. In the same sense as B. 3.

3. A small square or cubic body.

"Young creatures have learned spelling of words by having them pasted upon little flat tablets or dies."—Watts.

II. Fig.: Hazard, chance, lot, fortune.

"Th' equal die of warre he well did know."—Spenser: F. Q., II. v. 18.

B. Technically:

1. Arch.: The cube or dado of a pedestal.

2. Games: A cube marked with figures on its respective sides and used in games of chance. The Greek dice were cubes, and were numbered like our own, 6-1, 5-2, 4-3, so that the opposite faces should add 7. They usually threw three dice. The original dice are supposed to have been knuckle-bones, and they still maintained their popularity after the more perfect numbered cube had been introduced. The bones were called tali, and were used five in number. The astragali were probably cubes without numbers, and played like the knuckle-bones; they were made of bone, stone, metal, ivory, or glass. The number of pieces used was similar to the number of the lines on the Greek abacus, and the digits of the hand. [ABACUS.] The game of astragalus is represented in ancient sculpture and in a painting in Herculaneum. Pliny mentions a group in bronze by Polykletus of two naked boys at play, then in the Atrium of Titus. The same subject in stone is in the British Museum. In the game of duodecim scripta the moves were determined by dice; the games of tali and tessera were played with dice. Dice similar to ours were found at Herculaneum, and the destruction which overwhelmed Pompeii surprised a hazard-party at their amusement; 1800 years afterward the dice were found in their bony hands, and the game yet unsettled. The dice-box of the ancients (fritillus) was of a cylindrical form, and had parallel indentations to turn the dice as they were shaken. (Knight.)

¶ In this sense the form dice alone is used in the plural: in all others, with the exception of A. I., 3, the form used is dies.

3. Metal:

(1) In punching-machines, a bed-piece which has an opening the size of the punch, and through which the piece is driven. This piece may be a planchet or blank, or it may be merely a plug driven out of the object to form a bolt or rivet hole. In nut-machines the nut-blanks may be made by one die and punched by another.

(2) Forging: A device consisting of two parts which coact to give to the piece swaged between them the desired form.

(3) Sheet-metal: A former and punch or a cameo and intaglio die between which a piece of sheet-metal is pressed into shape by a blow or simple pressure. [DROP-PRESS.]

(4) Coining: Both dies are intaglio, so as to make a cameo or raised impression upon each face of the planchet. The upper die has the obverse, the face, which is often the bust of the sovereign or national emblem. The lower die has the reverse, with an effigy, legend, value, escutcheon, as the case may be. Owing to the random way in which ornaments are disposed on coins, any general definition will no longer meet all cases. A die for coining, mechanically considered, is made by the following process: A piece of softened steel called a hub is prepared, and upon its end the design is cut. The steel is then hardened, and is used to make a matrix, in which the impression is intaglio, that is, sunken. A plug of softened steel a little larger than its ultimate size, and with the center a little raised, is placed on the bed of a screw-press, and the hardened matrix being placed upon it, pressure is brought to bear on the matrix, which delivers its impression on the face of the plug. The result is a salient impression, and forms the punch. In all cases where metal is condensed it becomes heated and hardened, and in this case it becomes necessary to withdraw the imperfect punch and anneal it, after which it receives another pressure from the matrix. This is repeated until the impression is fully developed. The punch, by a similar operation, is then employed to make a die. The die is then hardened, and may be used for coining or for making a new hub if the former should become injured. The first perfect die is generally retained for the purpose last mentioned. The date is put by hand into the dies to be used in coining, as it requires to be changed; and the first die and the hub may be preserved for many years and may make hundreds of dies. For the application of the dies, see COINING. A mode of procedure which saves one step in the above process is to engrave the design in intaglio in the first place. This, when hardened, forms a matrix, from which the punch is made; the punch being used to form the die for coining. A die will sometimes deliver 250,000 impressions before it is necessary to remove it from the coining-press; and sometimes a die will crack at the first impression. (Knight.)

"Such variety of dies made use of by Wood in stamping his money makes the discovery of counterfeits more difficult."—Swift.

(5) Engraving: An engraved plate or small roller of steel, subsequently hardened and used to deliver an impression upon the surface of a soft steel roller, which in turn is hardened and forms a mill. The die is intaglio, and the mill is cameo. The latter is used to impress a plate or a roller to be used for bank-note printing or calico-printing respectively. [TRANSFER-MACHINE; CLAMMING-MACHINE.]

(6) One of the pieces which combine to form a hollow screw for cutting threads on bolts and such like. The two portions are fitted in a stock. In some, the dies are set up by screws, in others by scrolls. [CLOCKS, DIES.]

4. Min.: A piece of hard iron placed in the pan to receive the friction of the muller. Between the die and the muller the ore is crushed.

¶ To cast the die:

(1) Lit.: To throw dice from the dice-box.

(2) Fig.: To run a risk or hazard.

"With such small force did Bruce at last The die for death or empire cast!"—Scott: Lord of the Isles, v. 2.

die-sinker, s.

Engraving: One who cuts or engraves dies for coins, medals, &c.

die-sinking, s.

Engraving: The art of making dies for coins, medals, &c. It is a branch of engraving, but involves turning, tempering, and the use of other tools besides the graver.

die-stock, s.

Metal-working: A frame to hold the dies for cutting external screw-threads. The dies are detached pieces of steel, containing the thread on their inner curved surfaces, and these fit into grooves or upon ridges in the slot of the die-stock, being closed upon the bolt to be threaded by means of a set-screw. Plier die-stocks are made by setting removable dies in the jaws of pliers.

die-weed, s. [DYE-WEED.]

di'-eb, s. [A native term.]

Zool.: A species of wild dog (Canis anthus) found in North Africa.

diëf-rën-bäch'-l-a, s. [Named after H. Dieffenbach, a German botanist.]

Bot.: A genus of Araceæ, tribe Anaporeæ. Dieffenbachia sequina is the Dumb-cane (q. v.).

di-ë-gë'-sis, s. [Gr. from diegeomai = to set out in detail, to narrate.] A description, narrative, history, or recital.

di-ëk'-ta-sis, s. [Greek = a stretching out.] A lengthening or drawing out of a short syllable.

di-ë-lëc'-tric, s. [Gr. dia = through, across, and Eng. electric (q. v.).]

Elect.: Any medium through or across which the electric force is transmitted by a process different from conduction, as in induction, a non-conductor separating a body electrified by conduction from the electrifying body.

di-ër'-ë-sis, s. [DIÆRESIS.]

di-ër-vil'-la, s. [Named after M. Dierville, the discoverer.]

Bot.: A genus of erect shrubs, belonging to the order Caprifoliaceæ. They are natives of this country, China, and Japan. Diervilla canadensis is a hardy shrub with yellow flowers.

di-ëg, s. [Lat.] A day.

dies non. [Lat.]

Law: A day when the courts do not sit, as a Sunday, a public holiday, &c.

bôil, bôy; pout, jôwî; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.
-cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shûn; -tion, -sion = shûn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shûs. -ble, -die, &c. = bël, dël.

di-ē-sis, s. [Gr. diesis=a division, a quarter-tone in music: dia=through, and hiemi=to send.]
1. Print.: The double dagger (‡), a reference-mark.

2. Music.: Originally the name of a semi-tone, called afterward a limma. In later writings, applied to a third or quarter of a tone in the enharmonic and chromatic scales. The modern enharmonic diesis is the interval represented by 125:128, that is, the difference between three true major-thirds and one octave.

di-ēt (1), di-ete, s. [Fr. diète; Sp., Port. & Ital. dieta; Low Lat. dieta, diceta=a ration of food; Gr. diaita=diet.]

1. An allowance of food, a ration.

"For his diet, there was a continual diet given him of the king."—Jeremiah lii. 34.

2. Food, provisions, meat.

"Of his diète mesurable was he."

Chaucer: C. T., 437.

3. An article of food.

"Milk appears to be a proper diet for human bodies."—Arbuthnot.

4. A course of food prescribed or regulated medically for the prevention or treatment of disease, preservation of health, &c.

"I commend rather some diet for certain seasons, than frequent use of physic; for those diets alter the body more, and trouble it less."—Bacon.

¶ To take diet: To be under a regimen for a disease, which anciently was cured by severe discipline of that kind.

"To fast, like one that takes diet."—Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen of Verona, ii. 1.

¶ For the difference between diet and food, see Food.

diet-bread, s. A sort of sweet cake.

diet-drink, s. A medicated liquor; drink brewed with medical ingredients.

"The observation will do that better than the lady's diet-drinks."—Locke.

di-ēt (2), dy-ett, s. [Essentially the same word as diēt (1), s.; but "the peculiar sense of the word undoubtedly arose from a popular etymology that connected it with the Lat. dies=a day, especially a set day, a day appointed for public business; whence, by extension, a meeting for business, an assembly." (Skeat.)]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A journey, an expedition.

"His diet would be sooner perhaps than was looked for."—Calderswood, p. 248.

2. The fixed day for holding a market.

"This market being ruled by the dyets of the nolt-market of Wigton."—Symson: Descr. Galloway, p. 26.

II. Technically:

Polit.: A meeting or assembly of delegates or dignitaries convened and held from day to day for legislative, ecclesiastical, political, or administrative purposes; specif., the legislative assemblies of the German Empire, Austria, the Cantons of Switzerland, &c. The Diet of the German Empire was composed of three colleges; one of electors, one of princes, and one of imperial towns, and commenced with the edict of Charles IV. in 1356. The best known meetings were those at Nuremberg, 1467, Worms, 1521 (at which Luther was excommunicated), Spire, 1529, and Augsburg, 1530.

"And (save debates in Warsaw's diet)

He reign'd in most unseemly quiet."

Byron: Maizeppa, iv.

diet-booke, s. A diary, a journal.

"It [conscience] is a diet-booke, wherein the sinnes of everie day are written, and for that cause to the wicked a mother of feare."—Epistle of Christian Brother (1624), p. 26.

diet-house, s. A dining or banqueting hall.

"His diet-houses, intertainment, and all other things necessary."—Holinshed: Chron. of Ireland, p. 133.

di-ēt, di-ete, v. t. & i. [DIET, s.]

A. Transitive

1. Literally:

1. To feed.

"They must be dieted like mules."—Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I., i. 2.

2. To feed according to the rules of medicine.

"I will attend my husband, be his nurse, Diet his sickness, for it is my office."

Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, v. i.

3. To support with food, to nourish.

"Dieted by thee, I grow mature."

Milton: P. L., ix. 803.

*1. To eat, to feed.

"Spare Fast, that oft with gods doth diet."

Milton: Il Penseroso, 46.

†2. To eat or take food according to a prescribed regimen, or the rules of medicine.

di-ēt-a-ry, a. & s. [Eng. diet; -ary.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining to a regimen or the rules of diet.

"Statistics, dietary tables, commissioners' rules, &c."—Dietetics: Coningsby.

B. As substantive:

1. A regimen; a prescribed system or course of diet; rules of diet.

"References to dietaries."—Dietetics: Coningsby.

2. A fixed allowance of food given daily.

di-ēt-ēr, s. [Eng. diet; -er.] One who prescribes or prepares food according to rules.

"And sauced our broth, as Juno had been sick,

And he her dieter."—Shakesp.: Cymbel., iv. 2.

di-ē-tēt-ic, a. & s. [Gr. diatētikos.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining to diet, or the use of food according to medical rules.

"This book of Cheyne's produced even sects in the dietetic philosophy."—Arbuthnot: On Aliments (Pref.).

B. As subst. (Pl.): That branch of medicine which relates to the proper use of food, so as to adapt the quantity and quality of the diet to the particular state of each person, and to extract the greatest quantity of nutriment from a given quantity of nutritive matter.

di-ē-tēt-ic-al, a. [Eng. dietetic; -al.] Of or pertaining to diet; dietetic.

"He received no other counsel than to refrain from cold drink, which was but a dietetical caution."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

di-ē-tēt-ic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. dietetical; -ly.] In a dietetical manner; according to the rules of diet.

di-ē-tēt-ist, s. [Gr. diatētikos.] One who is skilled in dietetics; a dietist.

di-ēth-ēr-ē-scope, s. [Gr. dia=through, and aithēr=ether, the upper, purer air; or diathros=quite clear and fine, and skopeō=to look at.] An instrument for geodesy and for teaching optics, invented by G. Luvin, of Tunis, and announced by him in April, 1876. (Haydn.)

di-ēth-yl, in compos. [Pref. di=twice, two-fold, and Eng. &c., ethyl (q. v.).]

Chem.: This term denotes that two atoms of hydrogen in an organic compound have been each replaced by the monad radical ethyl, (C₂H₅).

diethyl-carbinol, s. (AMYL ALCOHOL.)

di-ēth-yl, s. [BUTANE.]

di-ēthyl-i-a, s. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. ethyl (q. v.).]

Chem.: A compound obtained from ethylia by the action of ethylic bromide, and subsequent distillation with potash. It resembles ethylia very much in its reactions. Formula, (C₂H₅)₂HN: boiling point, 57° C.

di-ēt-ic, s. [Eng. dietic; -ic.] A system of diet.

"Gentle dietics or healing applications."—Gauden: Tears of the Church, p. 397. (Davies.)

"Each beck of yours shall be in stead of a dieu-garde unto me."—Florio: Second Frutes (1691), p. 81.

dif-fār-rē-ā-tion, s. [Lat. diffarreatio, from diff=dis=apart, and farreum=a cake made of spelt; far=a kind of grain, spelt.]

Rom. Antiq.: The breaking of a cake between man and wife, as a sign of divorce. The opposite of con-farreatio (q. v.).

diff-fēr (1), v. t. & t. [Lat. differo=to carry in opposite directions: diff=dis=apart, and fero=to carry; Ital. differire; Sp. diferir; Fr. differer.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To be dissimilar, distinct, or unlike; to have properties, qualities or characteristics different from those of another.

"Differing in language, manners, or in face."

Cowper: Charity, 21.

*2. It is now followed by from, but formerly with was occasionally used.

"Idolatry . . . differeth but a letter with idolatry."—Bp. Andrews: Ser., vol. ii., p. 323.

3. To disagree in opinion, to dissent; not to be in accord; followed either by from or by with.

"There are certain measures to be kept, which may leave tendency rather to gain than to irritate those who differ with you in their sentiments."—Addison: Freeholder.

4. To be at variance; to dispute, to contend, to quarrel.

"A man of judgment shall sometimes hear ignorant men differ, and know well within himself that those which so differ mean one thing, and yet they themselves never agree."—Bacon.

B. Transitive:

1. To make different, distinct, or unlike.

"A different dialect or pronunciation differs persons of divers countries."—Derham: Physico-Theol., bk. v., ch. ix., note 1.

2. To set at variance; to cause a difference between.

"For as gude and as bonny as she is, if Maister Angus and her mak it up, I'fse ne'er be the man to differ them."—Saxon and Gael, i. 78.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to differ, to dissent, to disagree, and to vary: "Differ, vary, and disagree, are applicable either to persons or things; dissent to persons only. First as to persons: to differ is the most general and indefinite term, the rest are but modes of difference: we may differ from any cause or in any degree; we vary only in small matters; thus persons may differ or vary in their statements. There must be two at least to differ; and there may be an indefinite number: one may vary, or an indefinite number may vary; two or a specific number disagree: thus two or more may differ in an account which they give; one person may vary at different times in the account which he gives; and two particular individuals disagree: we may differ in matters of fact or speculation; we vary only in matters of fact; we disagree mostly in matters of speculation. Historians may differ in the representation of an affair, and authors may differ in their views of a particular subject; narrators vary in certain circumstances; two particular philosophers disagree in accounting for a phenomenon. To disagree is the act of one man with another; to dissent is the act of one or more in relation to a community; thus two writers on the same subject may disagree in their conclusions, because they set out from different premises; men dissent from the established religion of their country according to their education and character. When applied to the ordinary transactions of life, differences may exist merely in opinion, or with a mixture of more or less acrimonious and discordant feeling; variances arise from a collision of interests; disagreements from asperity of humor; dissensions from a clashing of opinions; differences may exist between nations, and may be settled by cool discussions; when variances arise between neighbors, their passions often interfere to prevent accommodations. . . . In regard to things, differ is said of two things with respect to each other; vary of one thing in respect to itself: thus, two tempers differ from each other, and a person's temper varies from time to time. Differ is said of everything promiscuously, but disagree is only said of such things as might agree; thus two trees differ from each other by the course of things, but two numbers disagree which are intended to agree." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dif-fēr (2), v. t. [O. Fr. differer.] [DEFER.] To defer, to delay.

"It is folye to differ the thing tyll tomorrow (that had nede to be done by and by)."—Palsgrave.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The state or condition of being different or distinct from, or unlike something else; dissimilarity, unlikeness, dissimilitude, diversity.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mātē, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

2. The quality or property by which one thing differs from another.
3. The disproportion between two things.
"Mark now the difference, ye that boast your love Of kings, between your loyalty and ours."
Cowper: Task, v. 346, 347.
4. A distinction, a distinguishing.
"Making a difference."—Jude 22.
5. An evidence of distinction; a differential mark.

[II. 1.]

"Henry had the title of sovereign, yet did not put those things in execution which are the true marks and differences of sovereignty."—Davies.

*6. A part, a division.

"There be of time three differences: the first from the Creation of man to the Flood, or Deluge, . . . the second from the Flood to the first Olympias."—Holland: Camden, p. 34. (Davies.)

7. A point or question in dispute; a ground of controversy.

"Are you acquainted with the difference That holds this present question in the court?"
Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.

8. A dispute, a quarrel, a controversy, a contention, a disagreement, a variance.

"Nothing could have fallen out more unluckily than that there should be such differences among them."—Tilzotson.

9. A disagreement in opinion; dissent.

II. Technically:

1. Her.: A certain figure added to a coat-of-arms, serving to distinguish one family from another, or to show how distant a younger branch is from the elder or principal branch.

Thus the eldest-son (during the lifetime of his father) bears a label; the second son, a crescent; the third, a mullet; the fourth, a martlet; the fifth, an annulet; the sixth, a fleur-de-lis; the seventh, a rose; the eighth, a cross-moline; the ninth, a double quatre-foil.

2. Logic: The mark or marks by which the species is distinguished from the rest of its genus; the specific characteristic.

3. Math.: The remainder of a sum or quantity when a number or quantity is subtracted from it.

"The difference of the two float lines gives the height in question."—Herschel: Astronomy (1838), § 286.

4. Geography:

(1) Difference of latitude: An arc of the meridian included between the parallels of latitude in which two places lie.

(2) Difference of longitude: An arc of the equator comprehended between the meridians of two places.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between difference, variety, diversity, and medley: "Difference and variety seem to lie in the things themselves; diversity and medley are created either by accident or design; the difference may lie in two objects only; a variety cannot exist without an assemblage; . . . where a number of men come together with different habits, we may expect to find a medley of characters; good taste may render a diversity of color agreeable to the eye; caprice or bad taste will be apt to form a ridiculous medley of colors and ornaments. A diversity of sounds heard at a suitable distance in the stillness of the evening, will have an agreeable effect on the ear; a medley of noises, whether heard near or at a distance, must always be harsh and offensive."

(2) He thus discriminates between difference and distinction: "Difference lies in the thing; distinction is the act of the person; the former is, therefore, to the latter as the cause to the effect; the distinction rests on the difference; those are equally bad logicians who make a distinction without a difference, or who make no distinction where there is a difference. Sometimes distinction is put for the ground of distinction, which brings it nearer in sense to difference, in which case the former is a species of the latter: the difference is either external or internal; the distinction is always external; we have differences in character, and distinctions in dress: the difference between profession and practice, though very considerable, is often lost sight of by professors of Christianity; in the sight of God, there is no rank or distinction that will screen a man from the consequences of unrepented sins."

(3) He thus discriminates between difference, alteration, dispute, and quarrel: "All these terms are here taken in the general sense of a difference on some personal question; the term difference is here as general and indefinite as in the former case: a difference, as distinguished from the others, is generally of a less serious and personal kind; a dispute consists not only of angry words, but much ill blood and unkind offices; an altercation is a wordy dispute, in which difference of opinion is drawn out into a multitude of words on all sides; quarrel is the most serious of all differences, which leads to every species of violence: the difference may sometimes arise from a misunderstanding, which may be easily rectified; differences seldom grow to disputes but by the fault of both parties; altercations arise mostly from pertinacious adherence to, and obstinate defense of, one's opinions; quarrels mostly spring from injuries real or supposed: differences subsist between men in an individual or public capacity; they may be carried on in a direct or indirect manner; disputes and altercations are mostly conducted in a direct manner between individuals; quarrels may arise betwixt nations or individuals, and be carried on by acts of offense directly or indirectly." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

difference-engine, s. The same as Babbage's Calculating Machine. [CALCULATING MACHINE.]

difference tones, s. pl.

Music: A third tone produced when two different musical notes are sounded, the rate of vibration of which is equal to the difference of the rates of the primary tones. (Rossiter.)

dif-fér-ence (2), dif-fér-rence, s. [DIFFER (2), v.] Delay, procrastination.

"Utherwise the hail world may see that it is bot difference that ye desire, and not to half the mater at ane perlyte tryall."—Crosraguell (Keith's Hist., App. p. 198).

dif-fér-ence, v. t. [DIFFERENCE, s.] To cause or make a difference in; to make different; to vary; to distinguish.

"We see nothing that differences the courage of Mnesemus from that of Sergesthus."—Pope: Essay on Homer.

dif-fér-enced, pa. par. & a. [DIFFERENCE, v.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Distinguished, varied, made different.

"The style is *difference*d, but *difference*d in the smallest degree possible."—Coleridge: Table Talk.

2. Her.: Marked or distinguished with a difference.

dif-fér-ence-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DIFFERENCE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of making a difference or distinction.

dif-fér-ent, a. [Fr. différent; Sp. diferente; Ital. differente; Lat. differens, pr. par. of differo.] [DIFFER (1), v.]

1. Unlike, dissimilar.

"Soon, however, appeared a very different version of the story."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xviii.

¶ It is properly followed by from, but to was formerly commonly, and is still occasionally, used. Different than was also used.

2. Distinct; not the same.

"There are covered galleries that lead from the palace to five different churches."—Addison: On Italy.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between different, distinct, and separate: "Difference is opposed to similitude; there is no difference between objects absolutely alike; distinctness is opposed to identity; there can be no distinction where there is only one and the same being: separation is opposed to unity; there can be no separation between objects that coalesce or adhere: things may be different and not distinct, or distinct and not different: different is said altogether of the internal properties of things; distinct is said of things as objects of vision, or as they appear either to the eye or the mind: when two or more things are seen only as one, they may be different, but they are not distinct; but whatever is seen as two or more things, each complete in itself, is distinct, although it may not be different: two roads are said to be different which run in different directions, but they may not be distinct when seen on a map; on the other hand, two roads are said to be distinct when they are observed as two roads to run in the same direction, but they need not in any particular to be different: two stars of different magnitudes may, in certain directions, appear as one, in which case they are different, but not distinct; two books on the same subject, and by the same author, but not written in continuation of each other, are distinct books, but not different. What is separate must in its nature be generally distinct; but everything is not separate which is distinct; when houses are separate they are obviously distinct; but they may frequently be distinct when they are not positively separated: the distinct is marked out by some external sign, which determines its beginning and its end; the separate is that which is set apart, and to be seen by itself: distinct is a term used only in determining the singularity or plurality of objects; the separate only in regard to their proximity or to distance from each other; we speak of having a distinct household, but of living in separate apartments; of dividing one's subject into distinct heads, or of making things into separate parcels: the body and soul are different, inasmuch as they have different properties; they are distinct inasmuch as they have marks by which they may be distinguished, and at death they will be separate."

(2) He thus discriminates between different, several, divers, sundry, and various: "Several, from sever, signifies split or made into many: they may be either different or alike; there may be several different things, or several things alike, but there cannot be several divers things, for the word divers signifies properly many different. Sundry, from asunder or apart, signifies many scattered or at a distance, whether as it regards time or space. Various expresses not only a greater number, but a greater diversity than all the rest. The same thing often affects different persons differently: an individual may be affected several times in the same way; or particular persons may be affected at sundry times and in divers manners; the ways in which men are affected are so various as not to admit of enumeration: it is not so much to understand different languages as to understand several different languages; divers modes have been suggested and tried for the good education of youth."

(3) He thus discriminates between different and unlike: "Different is positive, unlike is negative: we look at what is different, and draw a comparison; but that which is unlike needs no comparison: a thing is said to be different from every other thing, or unlike to anything seen before; which latter mode of expression obviously conveys less to the mind than the former." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dif-fér-én-ti-à (ti as shí), s. [Lat.]

Logic: The same as DIFFERENCE, II. 2.

dif-fér-én-ti-ál (ti as shí), dif-fér-én-çl-ál, a. & s. [Eng. different; -ial.]

A. As adjective:

1. Ordinary Language:

1. Differing; consisting of a difference.

"Therefore weight is made by the differential, not the absolute pressure of earth."—Search: Light of Nature, vol. ii., pt. ii., ch. xxii.

2. Distinguishing; discriminating; making a difference or distinction.

II. Mathematics:

1. An epithet applied to an infinitely small quantity, so small as to be less than any assignable quantity; as a differential quantity.

2. Pertaining to differentials, or to mathematical or mechanical processes in which they are employed.

B. As substantive:

Math.: An infinitesimally small difference between two consecutive states of a variable quantity.

Mech.: A double block having sheaves of different sizes. [DIFFERENTIAL PULLEY.]

differential calculus, s.

Math.: The Differential Calculus is that branch of mathematics which has for its object the explanation of the method of deriving one determinate function from another by the process of differentiation. If in any determinate function of one variable we give to the variable a constant increment, and find the corresponding increment of the function, and then divide the increment of the function by the increment of the variable, we shall find a ratio which will in general be dependent upon the increment of the variable. If now we pass to the limit of this ratio, by making the increment of the variable equal to 0, we shall in general obtain a function of the original variable, which is called the differential co-efficient of the function. If this be multiplied by the differential of the variable, the result is called the differential of the function. Any function of a single variable will have one, and only one, differential co-efficient, and consequently it will have but one differential of the same order. The Differential Calculus consists of two parts. The first embraces the science of the differential calculus, and explains the methods of finding the differentials and successive differentials of all determinate functions. The second treats of the application of the differential calculus to the other branches of mathematics, as Algebra, Analytical Geometry, &c. [CALCULUS.] differential co-efficient, s.

Math.: The differential co-efficient of a function of one variable is a function whose form depends upon that of the given function, and which may be derived from it by a fixed law called the law of differentiation.

dôll, dôy; pòut, jôwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -clan, -tlan = shàn. -tlan, -sion = shùn. -tlan, -sion = zhùn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, dəl differential coupling, s.

Mach.: A form of extensible coupling, to vary the speed of the driven part of the machinery.

differential duties, s. pl.

Polit. Econ.: Duties which are not levied equally upon the productions of different countries; as when a tax on certain commodities is lighter in one country than it is in another.

differential equation, s.

Math.: An equation which expresses the relations between variables and their differentials. If a differential equation be differentiated, and its differential equation found, this is called a differential equation of the second order; and the differential equation of a differential equation of the second order is one of the third order, and so on.

differential feed, s.

Mach.: An arrangement by which a regular powerful and slow movement is obtained, for carrying forward a tool, from the motion-work whereby the tool is rotated.

differential gearing, s.

Mech.: A form of gearing first introduced by Dr. Wollaston in his trochometer, for counting the turns of a carriage-wheel, in which two cog-wheels of varying sizes are made to travel at the same absolute surface-rate and in the same direction, and communicate motion equivalent to the difference between the circumferences of the two.

differential machine, s. The same as Babbage's Calculating Machine. [CALCULATING MACHINE.]

differential motion, s.

Mech.: A contrivance by which a single combination is made to produce such a low rate of speed, as by ordinary arrangements could only be effected by a considerable train of mechanism. Such a combination is the differential pulley (q. v.).

differential pulley, s.

Mechanics: This, in a somewhat clumsy form, has been known for centuries under the name of the Chinese windlass, and one was found by the allied English and French armies to be in use for raising one of the drawbridges in the city of Pekin. The chain winds over two drums of different diameters, winding onto one as it unwinds from the other; the effect gained is as the difference between the two, the smaller the difference the greater the power and the less the speed. In the geared differential pulley the effect is produced by making one more tooth in one of the wheels the chain passes over than in the other.

differential screw, s.

Mech.: A screw invented by Hunter, the celebrated surgeon. Two threads of unequal pitch are upon the same shaft, one unwinding as the other winds. The effective progression is equal to the difference of the pitches of the two threads. By making this difference very small great power may be attained without the weakness due to a very fine screw.

differential thermometer, s.

Physics: A thermometer having two air-bulbs connected by a bent stem occupied by colored sulphuric acid. When one leg is exposed to heat, the air in the bulb is expanded, and the liquid in that leg of the instrument is depressed.

differential tones, s. pl.

Music: The same as DIFFERENCE TONES (q. v.).

differential windlass, s.

Mach.: A windlass whose barrel consists of two portions of varying diameters. The rope winds on to one as it winds off the other, the effect of a revolution being governed by the difference between the circumferences of the two portions. If it wind on to the larger and off to the smaller the load is raised, and conversely. [CHINESE WINDLASS.]

differential worm-wheel, s.

Mach.: A cog-wheel working with a screw on a shaft.

diff-ēr-ēn-ti-āl-lŷ (ti as shl), adv. [English differential; -ly.] By way of distinction or differentiation; in a distinctive manner.

"When biting serpents are mentioned in the Scripture, they are not differentially set from such as mischief by stings."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. vi., ch. xxvii.

diff-ēr-ēn-ti-āte (ti as shl), v. t. & i. [Lat. differentia=a difference.]

A. Transitive:I. Ordinary Language:

1. To make different or distinct; to make a difference between; to mark or distinguish by a difference.

2. To produce or cause differences in.

II. Technically:

1. Logic: To discriminate or distinguish between by observing the differentia or marks of differentiation.

2. Math.: To obtain the differential, or the differential co-efficient of.

3. Biol.: To assign or to set apart for a specific purpose; to specialize.

"We thus see that the musical apparatus is more differentiated or specialized in the Locustidae, which includes, I believe, the most powerful performers in the order."—Darwin: Descent of Man (1871), pt. ii., ch. x., vol. i., p. 355.

†B. Intrans.: To acquire a different or distinct character; to become differentiated.

diff-ēr-ēn-ti-ā-tion (ti as shl), s. [Eng. differentiat(e); -ion.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of differentiating, distinguishing, or discriminating differences or varieties.

2. A distinction or mark of difference.

II. Technically:

1. Logic: The act of discriminating or distinguishing between by observing the differentia or marks of difference.

2. Math.: The operation or process of differentiating a function.

3. Zool.: The assignment of each function to an organ specially devoted to it.

"He justly considers the differentiation and specialization of organs as the test of perfection."—Darwin: Descent of Man (1871), pt. i., ch. ii., vol. i., p. 61.

4. Biol.: The production or formation of different parts, organs, species, &c., by a process of evolution or development; as when the root and stem of a plant are developed from the root, or the leaves, branches, flowers, &c., from the stem.

diff-ēr-ēn-ti-ly, adv. [Eng. different; -ly.] In a different or varying manner; variously; not alike.

"He may consider how differently he is affected by the same thought."—Addison.

diff-ēr-ēn-s, pr. par. & a. [DIFFER, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Unlike; dissimilar; not agreeing.

"Differing multitudes."—Shakespeare: Cymbeline, iii. 6.

*2. Angry.

"His differing fury."

Chapman: Homer's Iliad, ix. 543.

diff-ēr-ēn-s-lŷ, adv. [Eng. differing; -ly.] In a differing or different manner; differently.

"Such protuberant and concave parts of a surface may remit the light so differing, as to vary a color."—Boyle.

diff-ēr-rēn-s, s. [Eng. differ (2), v.; -er.] Delayer; the person who delays.

"I say, quibble of both is the differer of the cause?"—Willcock, Lett. to Croisguell; Keith: Hist., App., p. 198.

diff-fib-ū-lāte, v. t. [Lat. diffibulatus, pa. par. of diffibulo: diff=dis=away, apart, and fibulo=to fasten with a buckle; fibula=a buckle.] To unbuckle, to unbutton.

diff-fiċ-īle, diff-n-ċil, diff-n-ċil, diff-n-cul, a. [Fr. & Ital. difficile; Sp. difficil; Lat. difficilis=difficult (q. v.).]

1. Difficult, hard, not easy.

"No matter so difficle for man to find out."

New Custom, ii. 2.

2. Backward, reluctant, scrupulous, hard to persuade.

"Quhair many persones were diffiell and scrupulous to len monyes, these have given their awin particular bandis."—Acts Chas. I. (ed. 1814), v. 479.

diff-fiċ-īle-nēss, diff-fiċ-īle-nēsse, s. [Eng. difficile; -ness.]

1. Difficulty, hardness.

2. Reluctance, hardness against persuasion, scrupulousness.

"The lighter sort of malignity turneth but to a crossness, or frowardness, or agniness to oppose, or diffiċtiness or the like."—Bacon: Essays; Goodness.

diff-fi-ċil-l-tāte, v. t. [Pref. Lat. diff=dis (neg.), and Eng. facilitate (q. v.).] To render difficult.

"The inordinateness of our love diffiċtate the duty."—Moutagu: Devout Essays, pt. i., tr. 15, § 4.

diff-fi-ċil-lŷe, adv. [Eng. difficul; -ly.] With difficulty, hardly.

"Difficulye, diffiċte. Difficulter, obscure."—Huloet.

diff-fi-ċult, diff-fi-ċulte, a. [A word somewhat rare in early authors, being merely developed from the sub. difficuly. (Skeat.) Ital. difficultoso, difficiltoso; Sp. difficultoso.]

1. Hard to do, execute, fulfill, or carry out; not easy; attended with labor, trouble, or pains; arduous, troublesome.

2. Hard to please or satisfy; austere, unaccommodating, crabbed, peevish, following a frequent use of the Latin difficilis.

3. Hard to understand.

† For the difference between difficult and hard, see HARD.

diff-fi-ċult, v. t. [DIFFICULT, a.]

1. To render difficult, to impede, to put difficulties in the way of.

"Their pretensions had diffiċulted the peace."—Sir W. Temple.

2. To perplex.

"What most diffiċulted the judges was, that the arrester could not confirm a disposition to which he had no right."—Kames: Suppl. Dec., p. 155.

diff-fi-ċul-tāte, v. t. [Lat. difficultatem, accus. of difficultas=difficulty (q. v.).] To render difficult.

diff-fi-ċult-ēd, pa. par. or a. [DIFFICULT, v.]

diff-fi-ċult-lŷ, adv. [Eng. difficult; -ly.] With difficulty, hardly.

"They nourish much, but diffiċultly digest."—Passenger of Benvenuto (1612).

diff-fi-ċult-nēss, diff-fi-ċult-nēss, s. [Eng. difficult; -ness.] Difficulty, hardness.

"The diffiċtiness of their present work."—Golding: Cæsar, Comment. (Pref.)

diff-fi-ċul-tŷ, diff-n-cul-tee, s. [Fr. difficulté; Prov. difficultat; Ital. difficoltà; Sp. difficultad; Lat. difficultas (accus. difficultatem), an abbrev. of difficilis, from Lat. difficilis=difficult: diff=dis=apart, away, and facilis=easy; facio=to do.]

1. The quality of being difficult or hard; hardness; a state or condition of anything to be done, fulfilled, or carried out, which causes labor or trouble.

"Such a divine might without diffiċulty be found."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ix.

2. That which is difficult to be done, fulfilled, or carried out.

"By mastering diffiċulties so . . .

He bravely came to disappoint his foe."

Daniel: Funeral Poem.

3. An obstacle, impediment, or hindrance; that which causes trouble, perplexity or embarrassment.

"But though she carefully abstained from doing or saying anything that could add to his diffiċulties, those diffiċulties were serious indeed."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ix.

4. Anything difficult or hard to be understood, explained, or believed; a difficult point or question.

"Let us see whether by attending to the practice of mathematicians . . . we can make any discovery preparatory to the solution of the diffiċulty."—Beattie: On Truth, pt. ii., ch. i., § 1.

5. An objection, caveat, scruple, or question.

"Men should consider, that raising diffiċulties concerning the mysteries in religion cannot make them more wise, learned, or virtuous."—Swift.

6. A serious complication likely to lead to a quarrel; an embroilment, a dispute, a misunderstanding.

7. (Pl.) Pecuniary embarrassment.

"A still higher value of money would perhaps cause some diffiċulties."—London Daily Telegraph.

† To be in diffiċulties: To be pecuniarily embarrassed.

† Blair thus discriminates between a diffiċulty and an obstacle: "A diffiċulty embarrasses; an obstacle stops. We remove the one; we surmount the other. Generally, the first expresses somewhat arising from the nature and circumstances of the affair; the second somewhat arising from a foreign cause." Philip found diffiċulty in managing the Athenians, from the nature of their dispositions; but the eloquence of Demosthenes was the greatest obstacle to his design." (Blair: Lect. on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres (1817), vol. i., p. 231.)

† (1) Crab thus discriminates between diffiċulties, embarrassments, and troubles: "These terms are all applicable to a person's concerns in life; but diffiċulties relate to the diffiċulty of conducting a business; embarrassments relate to the confusion attending a state of debt; and troubles to the pain which is the natural consequence of not fulfilling engagements or answering demands. Of the three, the first expresses the least, and troubles the most. A young man on his entrance into the world will unavoidably experience diffiċulties, if not provided with ample means on the outset. But let his means be ever so ample, if he have not prudence and talents fitted for business, he will hardly keep himself free from embarrassments, which are the greatest troubles that can arise to disturb the peace of a man's mind."

(2) He thus discriminates between diffiċulty, obstacle, and impediment: "All these terms include in their signification that which interferes with the actions or views of men. The diffiċulty lies most in the nature and circumstances of the thing itself; the obstacle and impediment consist of that which fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; plne, plt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; try, sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

is external or foreign: the difficulty interferes with the completion of any work; the obstacle interferes with the attainment of any end; the impediment interrupts the progress, and prevents the execution of one's wishes: the difficulty embarrasses, it suspends the powers of acting or deciding; the obstacle opposes itself, it is properly met in the way, and intervenes between us and our object; the impediment shackles and puts a stop to our proceedings: we speak of encountering a difficulty, surmounting an obstacle, and removing an impediment." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

diff-ide*, v. i. [Lat. diffido: diff=dis=apart, away, and ido=to trust.] In distrust; not to have confidence in.

"In the council-board he had the ability still to give himself the best council, but the unhappy modesty to diffide in it."—South: Sermons, vol. v., ser. 2.

diff-ide, diff-ide, diff-ide, s. [Lat. diffidentia, from diffidens, pr. par. of diffido=to distrust: diff=dis=apart, away, and ides=faith, confidence; Ital. diffidenza; Sp. diffidencia.]

*1. Distrust; want of faith or confidence in others; suspicion.

"Thou dost shame thy mother,
And wound her honor with this diffidence."
Shakesp.: King John, i. 1.

*2. A distrust in every one, almost amounting to despair.

"Of the impediments which have been in the affections, the principal whereof hath been despair or diffidence . . ."—Bacon: Of the Interpretation of Nature, ch. xix.

3. Distrust of one's self, or of one's powers; bashfulness, reserve.

"It is good to speak on such questions with diffidence."
—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

diff-ide, a. [Lat. diffidens, pr. par. of diffido; Sp. diffidente; Ital. diffidente.]

*1. Distrustful; without faith or confidence in others.

"Not diffident of thee do I dissuade Thy absence from my side."
Milton: P. L., v. 293, 294.

*2. Doubtful, uncertain; without a firm trust in. "You were always extremely diffident of their success."
—Methoth: Cicero, bk. ix., lett. iv.

*3. Having a modest distrust of one's self, or of one's own powers; bashful, modest, reserved.

"The diffident maidens."
Longfellow: Children of the Lord's Supper.

¶ For the difference between diffident and distrustful, see DISTRUSTFUL; for that between diffident and modest, see MODEST.

diff-ide, adv. [Eng. diffident; -ly.] In a diffident manner; with diffidence.

"In man humility's alone sublime,
Who diffidently hopes he's Christ's own care."
Smart: Hymn to the Supreme Being.

diff-ide*, v. t. [Lat. diffindo.] To cleave in two, to split.

diff-ide*, diff-ide, v. t. [Fr. définir.] To end, to conclude.

"The diffident ends of my labour."
—Maundeville, p. 315.

diff-ide*, s. [DEFINITION.]

"Yit herd I never tellen in myn age Upon this nombre diffidentious."
Chaucer: C. T., 5,606, 5,607.

diff-ide*, a. [DEFINITIVE.] Determinate, deciding, conclusive.

"The tribunal where we speak being not diffinitive, I now promised to ease his memory myself with an extract of what I had said."
—Sir H. Wotton: Letters, p. 537.

diff-ide*, s. [Lat. diffissio, from diffissus, pa. par. of diffindo.] The act of cleaving in two, or splitting.

diff-ide*, v. t. [Lat. diffatus, pa. par. of difflo=to blow about, to scatter.] To blow away, to dissipate, to scatter.

"Thereby are . . . vaporous and rheumatic superfluities discussed and diffated."
—Venner: Via Recta, p. 311.

diff-ide*, s. [Lat. diffatus, pa. par. of difflo=to blow about, to scatter: diff=dis=apart, and flo=to blow.] The act of scattering with a blast of wind.

diff-ide*, diff-ide, s. [Lat. diffuens, pr. par. of diffuo=to flow in different directions: diff=dis=apart, away, and fuo=to flow.] The quality or act of flowing or falling away on all sides; fluidity; the contrary to consistence.

"Ice is water congealed by the frigidity of the air, whereby it acquireth no new form, but rather a consistence or determination of its diffusency."
—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. i., ch. i.

diff-ide*, a. [Lat. diffuens, pr. par. of diffuo.] Flowing or falling away on all sides; not consistent.

diff-ide, s. [Lat. diffuo.]

Zool. A genus of Rhizopoda, of the family Arcellina. They are aquatic, and are contained in a spherical, or oblong, urceolate, incrustated carapace. There are numerous species.

diff-ide*, a. [Formed as if from a Lat. difformis, from diff=dis=apart, away, and forma=form.]

1. Irregular, or not uniform in shape; as, a difform flower or corolla, the parts of which do not correspond in size or proportion.

2. Unlike, dissimilar.

"The unequal refractions of difform rays proceed not from any contingent irregularities."
—Newton: Optics.

diff-ide*, s. [Fr. difformité.]

1. An irregularity or want of uniformity; a diversity in form.

"Without any possible difference, difformity, or variety whatsoever."
—Clarke: Attributes of God, § 7.

2. A diversity or divergence.

"They desire in them a difformity from the primitive rule."
—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

diff-ide*, v. t. [Lat. diffRACTUS, pa. par. of diffringo=to break in pieces: diff=dis=apart, and frango=to break.] To break in pieces; to break up as in a prism.

diff-ide*, s. [Lat. diffRACTUS.]

diff-ide*, s. [Lat. diffRACTUS.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of breaking up or in pieces; diffraction.

diff-ide, s. [Lat. diffRACTUS, pa. par. of diffringo.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The act of breaking in pieces.

2. Optics: [DIFFRACTION OF LIGHT.]

¶ Diffraction of light:

Optics: That peculiar modification which light undergoes when it passes by the edge of an opaque body by being deflected from its direct course.

diffraction gratings, s. pl.

Optics: A number of parallel lines placed very closely together, which when the light falls upon them so diffract it as to produce a spectrum with the rainbow colors.

diff-ide*, s. [DISFRANCHISE.]

diff-ide*, s. [DISFRANCHISEMENT.]

diff-ide*, a. [Lat. diffugio=to fly in different directions: diff=dis=away, apart, and fugio=to fly.] Flying divers ways, or in different directions.

diff-ide, v. t. [Lat. diffusus, pa. par. of diffundo=to pour abroad: diff=dis=apart, and fundo=to pour.]

I. Literally:

1. To pour abroad; to spread by pouring out.

"When these waters began to rise at first, long before they could swell to the height of the mountains, they would diffuse themselves every way."
—Burnet: Theory.

2. To circulate, to extend.

" . . . diffused through the senseless tronck."
Spenser: F. Q., II. ii. 4.

"Thence diffuse his good To worlds and ages infinite."
Milton.

II. Figuratively:

1. To spread or extend on every side.

"The poet and the historian are they who diffuse a luncheon upon the age."
—Goldsmith: On Polite Learning, ch. iii.

*2. To make confused or uncouth.

"If but as well I other accents borrow That can my speech diffuse."
Shakesp.: Lear, i. 4.

¶ For the difference between diffuse and to spread, see SPREAD.

diff-ide, a. [Lat. diffusus.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: Scattered, widely spread or dispersed.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Wide, copious, full.

"A diffuse and various knowledge of divine and human things."
—Milton: To the Parliament.

(2) Copious, prolix, verbose, full, not concise.

"The reasoning of them is sophistical and inconclusive; the style diffuse and verbose."
—Dr. Warton: Essay on Pope.

*3. Difficult, requiring a long time.

"It is diffuse to fynde
The sentence of his mind."
Skelton: Poems, p. 237.

II. Bot.: Spreading widely.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between diffuse and prolix: "The diffuse is properly opposed to the precise; the prolix to the concise or laconic. A diffuse writer is fond of amplification, he abounds in epithets, tropes, figures, and illustrations; the prolix writer is fond of circumlocution, minute details, and trifling particulars. Diffuseness is a fault only in degree, and according to circumstances; prolixity is a positive fault at all times. The former leads to the use of words unnecessarily; the latter to the use of phrases, as well as words, that are altogether useless; the diffuse style has too much of repetition; the prolix style abounds in tautology. Diffuseness often arises from an exuberance of imagination; prolixity from the want of imagination; on the other hand, the former may be coupled with great superficiality, and the latter with great solidity." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

diff-ide, pa. par. or a. [DIFFUSE, v.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

I. Lit.: Spread or scattered abroad.

*II. Figuratively:

—Glavin: Preexistence of Souls, ch. xi.

diff-ide, s. [Eng. diffuse; -ness.] The quality of being diffuse, prolix, or verbose; an excessive or superfluous wordiness or verbosity.

diff-ide, s. [Eng. diffuse; -er.] One who diffuses or spreads abroad.

"If the Jews were such diffusers of secular learning, . . ."
—Manningham's Disc. (1681), p. 32.

diff-ide, s. [Eng. diffusible; -ity.] The quality or state of being diffusible; capability of being diffused.

diff-ide, s. [Eng. diffus(e); -able.] That may or can be diffused; capable of being diffused.

diff-ide, s. [Eng. diffusible; -ness.] The same as DIFFUSIBILITY (q. v.).

diff-ide, s. [Lat. diffusio, from diffusus, pa. par. of diffundo.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of spreading abroad; diffusion.

diff-ide, s. [Lat. diffusio, from diffusus, pa. par. of diffundo.]

1. The act of diffusing or spreading about of a liquid, fluid, &c.

"A sheet of very well sleeked marbled paper did not throw its light with an equal diffusion."
—Boyle: On Colors.

2. A spreading or diffusing abroad of a matter.

3. The state of being spread or dispersed widely.

4. The act of spreading, extending, or propagating widely, as the diffusion of knowledge.

*5. Copiousness, exuberance of style; prolixity, verbosity.

¶ (1) Diffusion of gases:

Chem.: The passing of one gas into the space occupied by another. The name given to that phenomenon by which the composition of the atmosphere is kept uniform, or nearly so. When two gases, which do not act chemically on each other, are mixed together in any proportions, they will, after a short time, become diffused through each other, so that, whatever may be their respective densities, they become intimately blended, the heavier gas no falling nor the lighter rising. Gases diffuse into one another according to a fixed law, that is, inversely as the square root of their densities. [DIFFUSION-VOLUME.]

(2) Diffusion of heat:

Phys.: A term applied to those modes by which the equilibrium of heat is effected—viz., conduction, radiation, and connection.

(3) Diffusion of liquids: When two liquids that are capable of mixing are put in contact they gradually diffuse one into the other, notwithstanding the action of gravity. Thus, if a vessel containing a solution of common salt be placed carefully, with its mouth covered, in a vessel containing water, the water being sufficiently deep to cover the vessel of salt and water, and if the cover be removed from that vessel, in time the salt and water solution will diffuse out into the larger vessel, and the water into the smaller vessel, until both liquids are of equal density.

diffusion-apparatus, s.

Sugar Manufacture: A mode of extracting the sugar from cane or beet-root by dissolving it out with water. It is adopted in some establishments in British India and in Austria.

diffusion-tube, s.

Chem.: An instrument for determining the rate of diffusion of different gases. It consists of a graduated tube closed at one end by plaster-of-Paris—a substance which, when moderately dry, possesses the required porosity.

diffusion-volume, s.

Chem.: A term used to denote the different dispositions of gases to become diffused into others.

diff-fu-sive, a. [Fr. diffusif; Ital. diffusivo; Sp. diffusivo, from Lat. diffusus, pa. par. of diffundere.]
1. Scattering or spreading widely; diffusing.

"Diffusive of themselves, where'er they pass
They make that warmth in others they expect."
Dryden: Annus Mirabilis, liii.

2. Scattered, spreading, or extending widely.

"And each diffusive harmony unite."
Thomson: Winter, 581.

3. Widely spread or distributed; collective.

"They are not agreed amongst themselves where infallibility is seated; whether in the pope alone or in the diffusive body of Christians."—Tillotson.

4. Capable of diffusion.

"All liquid bodies are diffusive."—Burnet: Theory of the Earth.

5. Copious, diffuse, full, not concise.

"If I were to choose I should clearly give the preference to this style, . . . full and diffusive."—Melmoth: Pity, bk. i., lett. 20.

6. Wide, general, universal, extensive.

"No man is of so general and diffusive a lust, as to prosecute his amours all the world over."—South.

diff-fu-sive-ly, adv. [Eng. diffusive; -ly.]

1. Widely, extensively, diffusively.

"Through secret streams diffusively they bless."
Young: Love of Fame, sat. vi.

2. In a diffuse, verbose, or copious manner; diffusely.

diff-fu-sive-ness, s. [Eng. diffusive; -ness.]

1. The power or quality of diffusing; the state of being diffused.

2. The state of being widely spread or extending; wideness, extensiveness.

"As may appear by the diffusiveness of his learning."
Fuller: Worthies, Wiltshire. (Horemam.)

3. Prolixity, copiousness, want of conciseness, fullness.

"The fault that I find with a modern legend is its diffusiveness."—Addison: On Medals.

di-fu-en, s. [Pref. *di=dis=*away, apart, and Lat. fluere=to flow.]

Chem.: A term for a solution of alloxanic acid, which is thereby decomposed into this substance and an acid named leucotic acid.

dig, *deg-gen, *dig-gen, *dygge, dyg-gyn (pa. t. digged, dug), v. t. & i. [A. S. dician=to make a dike or ditch; dica=a dike or ditch; cogn. with Sw. dika=to dig a ditch; dike=a ditch; Dan. dige=(v.) to dig, (s.)=a ditch (Skeat).] [DIKE, DITCH.]

"Digging up the cellars of London in order to collect the nitrous particles from the walls."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xviii.

B. Intransitive:

1. Literally:

1. To work with a spade.

"I cannot dig; to beg I am ashamed."—Luke xvi. 3.

2. To make a hole in, with a spade or similar instrument.

"But he that had received one went and digged in the earth, and hid his lord's money."—Matt. xxv. 18.

3. To seek for, to try to win by digging.

*II. Fig.: To seek for.

" . . . dig for it more than for hid treasures."—Job iii. 21.

dig, s. [DIG, v.]

1. A thrust, a blow, a poke. (Colloq.)

2. A diligent or plodding student. (U. S.)

di-gál-lic, a. [Pref. di = twice, twofold, and Eng. gállic (q. v.).]

II. Chem.: A strong boiler with a tightly-fitting cover closed by a screw, and used to expose food to a heat above 212°, invented by Dr. Papin in 1680. By a certain increment of heat the gelatine is separated from the phosphate of lime of the bones; the earthy particles sinking to the bottom. It has a safety-valve on the top to allow steam to escape when it begins to acquire a dangerous tension. It was in contriving this boiler that Dr. Papin invented the safety-valve. The lard and other grease tanks used for working up poor carcasses and the offal of slaughter-houses belong to this class of apparatus. Thousands of carcasses of cattle and sheep too poor for the market are thus worked up yearly in the United States, and the lard-tank is a regular feature in the hog-slaughtering centers, (Chicago, Cincinnati, &c., where the entrails and other offal yielding grease are thus treated on a large scale. (Knight.)

"March 12th, 1682. I went this afternoon with several of the Royal Society to a supper, which was all dressed, both fish and flesh, in Dr. Papin's digestors, by which the hardest bones of beefe itselfe and mutton were made as soft as cheese, without water or other liquor."—Evelyn: Memoirs.

di-gēst-i-bil-i-ty, s. [Eng. digestible; -ity.] The quality of being digestible.

"The digestibility and easy dissolution of it [meat] is obstructed."—Cheyne: On Regimen, disc. 2.

di-gēst-i-ble, a. [Lat. digestibilis; Fr. & Sp. digestible; Italian digestibile.] Capable of being digested.

"His diete . . . was of no superfluite,
But of gret norisching and digestible."

Chaucer: C. T., 438, 489.

†di-gēst-i-ble-ness, s. [Eng. digestible; -ness.] The quality of being digestible; digestibility.

di-gēst-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [Digest, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. The act of disposing or arranging methodically, under proper heads or titles.

"For the full digesting of many things in order."—Drake West Indian Voyage, p. 9.

2. The act or process of digestion.

di-gēst-ion (ion as yon), *digestioun, *dy-gestioun, *dygestioun, s. [Lat. digestio, from digestus, pa. par. of digero=to digest; Fr. & Sp. digestion; Ital. digestione.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) The act or process of digesting or concocting food in the stomach; the conversion of food into chyme, for circulation throughout the body and nourishment. [CHYME.] This is a chemical process, in which the gastric juices assist greatly. [GASTRIC.]

"Their appetite is to be invited and their digestion helped."—Bp. Taylor: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 16.

(2) The digestive organs.

"Some digestions turn all meat to phlegm."

Dorset: To Howard.

2. Figuratively:

(1) The maturation of a design; the reducing of things to order and method.

"The digestion of the counsels in Sweden is made in Senate."—Sir W. Temple.

†(2) Meditation, consideration.

"Commending these salutary thoughts to their digestion."—London Daily Telegraph.

(3) The dissolution and preparation of substances, as plants, &c., for manure, as in compost.

II. Technically:

1. Medicine:

(1) The disposition of a wound or sore to suppurate or generate pus.

"The first stage of healing is by surgeons called digestion."—Sharpe: Surgery.

(2) An application which causes a wound or sore to suppurate or generate pus.

2. Chem.: The process or operation of exposing bodies to a gentle heat, to prepare them for some action on each other; the slow action of a solvent on any substance.

3. Bot.: The absorption of carbonic acid by plants under the influence of light. (Carpenter.)

4. Physiol.: The process by which the reduction in the stomach of the food to a nearly fluid condition is performed, by means of the gastric juice, and its active principle, pepsin. Digestion has three purposes to fulfill: the reduction of the food to the fluid form; the separation of that which can be assimilated into organized texture from that which is useless for the purpose, and which is at once rejected; and the alteration of the chemical constitution of the first, which prepares it for the important changes it has to undergo. Eating too much or too fast retards digestion, as does the use of cold water or ice at meal times, from their injurious effects on the gastric juices. The pulpy substance, which is the product of digestion, or the reducing action of the gastric juice, is called chyme.

†Digestion of Food: The following table shows the time, in hours and fractions of hours, required for the digestion of the more common articles of food:

Kind of Food.	Hrs.	Kind of Food.	Hrs.
Rice, boiled.	1	Eggs, soft-boiled.	3

"Digestive cheese and fruit there sure will be."

B. Jonson: Epigram 101.

(2) Having the power of digesting; pertaining to digestion.

"The wonderful digestive powers of the ostrich."—S. J. Hervey: Cathol. Angl., s. v. Ostriche, p. 262.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Softening by heat.

"The one active, piercing, and digestive, by its heat."—Hale.

(2) Digesting, or arranging methodically.

"To business, ripened by digestive thought,
His future rule is into method brought;
As they who first proportion understand
With easy practice reach a master's hand."

Dryden: Astræa Redux, 89-92.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: Dissolving, or capable of dissolving by heat.

2. Med.: Causing suppuration in wounds or sores.

B. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: Any substance or article of food which aids or promotes digestion; a stomachic, a corroborant.

"Whereof it is written in the table of digestives."—Elyot: Castel of Helth, bk. iv., ch. i.

2. Med.: An application which ripens a sore or wound, disposing it to generate pus, or suppurate.

"I dressed it with digestives."—Wiseman: On Abscesses.

†digestive animals.

Zool.: The name given by Oken to the animals of lower organization, one chief function of which is the digestion of food.

digestive apparatus.

Anat.: The organs of digestion. The name is applied chiefly to the alimentary canal and the various glands of which it receives the secretions. (Quain.) digestive canal.

Compar. Anat.: The same as the ALIMENTARY CANAL (q. v.).

digestive system.

Anat.: The same as DIGESTIVE APPARATUS (q. v.).

†di-gēst-ive-ly, adv. [Eng. digestive; -ly.] By way of digestion. (W. Collins: Dead Secret.) dig-It, s. [Lat. digitus=a finger; Gr. daktylos.]

I. Ordinary Language:

- *1. A finger.

"The innermost digit is often stunted."—Owen.

2. The measure of a finger's breadth, or three-quarters of an inch.

"If the inverted tube of mercury be but twenty-five digits high."—Boyle: Spring of the Air.

3. In the same sense as II. 1.

II. Technically:

1. Arith.: Any integer under 10; so called from the primitive mode of counting on the fingers.

"Computable by digits."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. iv., ch. 12.

- *2. Astron.: The twelfth part of the diameter of the sun or moon; a term used to express the quantity or magnitude of an eclipse; thus an eclipse is said to be of six digits when one-half of the disk is red.

dig-It, v. t. [DIGIT, s.] To point at with the finger.

"I shall never care to be dighted with 'That is he.'"—Felltham: Resolves, pt. i., No. 28.

dig-I-tal, a. & s. [Lat. digitalis.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining to the fingers or digits, or the toes. Thus there are digital arteries of the foot as well as of the hand.

B. As subst.: A finger.

"Paste rings upon unwashed digitals."—Lytton: What Will He Do with It? bk. iv., ch. ix.

digital cavity, s.

Anat.: The occipital portion of the lateral ventricle of the brain.

digital impressions, s. pl.

Anat.: The slight depressions observable on the inner surface of the bones of the cranium, which correspond to the cerebral convolutions.

di-git-a-lein, s. [Lat. digita(lis), and suff. -ein.] A bright yellow powder obtained from the aqueous extract of foxglove leaves. It is said to be a non-azotized glucoside.

dig-I-tā-ll-a, s. [DIGITALINE.] dig-I-tāl-ic, a. [Eng. digital(in); -ic.] Of or pertaining to digitals.

digitalic acid, s.

Chem.: $C_{54}H_{86}O_{33}$. [DIGITALIRETIN.]

di-gl-tā-ll-ē-sē, s. pl. [Lat. digitali(s), and fem. pl. adj. suff. -ē-sē.]

Bot.: In the arrangement of Scrophulariaceæ given by Mr. Bentham and adopted by Dr. Lindley, a tribe of the sub-order Rhinanthideæ.

dig-I-tā-ll-form, a. [Lat. digitalis=pertaining to a finger, and forma=form.]

Bot.: Resembling a finger in form; applied to the slightly irregular campanulate corolla of Digitalis.

dig-I-tā-lln, dig-I-tā-line (1), s. [Mod. Lat. digital(is)=foxglove, and Eng. &c., suff. -in, -ine (Chem.) (q. v.).]

Chem.: $C_{25}H_{40}O_{15}$. A vegetable alkaloid which occurs along with digitin (digitonin $C_{31}H_{52}O_{17}$) in the Foxglove (Digitalis purpurea). It is obtained by exhausting the leaves with alcohol, and adding to the concentrated solution three times its bulk of water, which precipitates the alkaloids; they are separated by chloroform, which dissolves the digitalin and leaves the digitin. Digitalin crystallizes in slender, shining needles, which dissolve in hydrochloric acid, forming an emerald-green solution on the addition of water; the alkaloid is precipitated as a resin. Sulphuric acid dissolves it, forming a green solution, which is turned light-red by bromine vapor; on the addition of water the green color is restored. Digitalin is an active poison. It is doubtful whether the alkaloid has been obtained pure.

dig-I-tā-line (2), s. [Lat. digitalis=pertaining to a finger; digitus=a finger.]

Zool.: A genus of ciliated Infusoria, belonging to the family Vorticellidæ, and characterized by the oblong, cylindrical, urn-shaped body surrounding a slender hollow stalk. They are commonly found growing on the backs of minute freshwater crustaceans, such as the water-flea (Daphnia), &c., whose movements are often seriously impeded by the number of these Infusoria adhering to them.

dig-I-tal-ir-ēt-in, s. [Mod. Lat. digitalis; second element not obvious; suff. -etin.]

Chem.: $C_{30}H_{50}O_{10}$. A glucoside obtained by boiling digitaline with a dilute alkaline solution and precipitating by an acid, which gives digitalic acid, $C_{54}H_{86}O_{33}$, a substance crystallizing from alcohol, and capable of forming crystalline salts. By boiling with acids it is resolved into digitaliretin and glucose. (Miller.)

dig-I-tā-lls, s. [Lat. digitalis, from digitus=a finger, from the flowers being put on their fingers by children.]

1. Bot.: A genus of plants belonging to the natural order Scrophulariaceæ. They are natives of Europe and Western Asia. There are numerous species, all of them tall herbs. Digitalis purpurea is the common Foxglove.

2. Pharm.: The dried leaves of the Foxglove are used in medicine, as powder, infusion, or tincture, or in the form of the active principle, Digitaline. Digitalis purpurea belongs to the order Scrophulariaceæ, and is very useful in cases of heart disease, acting as a cardiac tonic and sedative, especially in mitral disease with dilated heart; also in delirium tremens and acute mania. It should not be given where the renal functions are disordered, as in chronic Bright's disease, but as a diuretic in the dropsy of the heart disease it is extremely useful. The powdered leaves or an extract of Digitalis purpurea, ochroleuca, lævigata, ferruginea, and other species, in overdoes produce vomiting, vertigo, and other symptoms, followed even by death.

dig-I-tār-I-a, s. [Lat. digit(us)=a finger, and neut. pl. adj. suff. -aria.]

Bot.: Finger-grass, a genus of grasses so named from the digitate spikes. There are two species: Digitaria sanguinalis, or Cock's-foot Finger-grass, and D. humifusa, Smooth Finger-grass.

dig-I-tāte, dig-I-tāt-ād, a. [Lat. digitatus=having fingers or toes; digitus=a finger.] Finger-shaped; applied to bodies whose parts branch out in finger-like processes; as e. g. to Alcyonia, the "Dead-men's Fingers" of the sea-shore; the leaves of the Horse-chestnut, &c.

"Animals multi-fidous, or such as are digitated."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

† (1) Digitate

Bot.: A compound leaf, having several leaflets arranged almost like a fan, as in the Lupins.

(2) Digitate

Bot.: A root having the tubercles divided into lobes like fingers, the divisions extending nearly to the base of the root, as in some species of Orchis.

1. Leaf. 2. Root.

dig-I-tāte, v. t. [DIGITATE, a.] To point out, to point to as with the finger.

"The resting on water, without motion, doth digitate a reason."—Robinson: Eudora (1658), p. 46.

dig-I-tā-te-ly, adv. [Eng. digitate; -ly.] In a digitate manner.

digitately-pinnate, a.

Bot.: An epithet applied to digitate leaves whose leaflets are pinnate.

dig-I-tā-tion, s. [Lat. digitatus, from digitus.]

Anat.: A division into fingers or finger-like processes, as exhibited by several of the muscles, particularly those of Serratus magnus and Obliquus externus, in their coalescence on the ribs.

di-gl-tā-tō-, in composition. [Latin digitatus.] [DIGITATE.]

Bot.: Digitate.

digitato-pinnate, a.

Bot.: The same as DIGITATELY-PINNATE (q. v.).

dig-I-ti-form, a. [Lat. digitus=finger, and forma=form.] Finger-shaped; formed like or having the appearance of fingers, as in the leaves of Hibiscus digitiformis.

dig-I-ti-grād-a, s. [Lat. digitus=a toe, and gradus=a walking, a step; gradior=to walk.]

Zool.: A section of the order Carnivora (q. v.), comprising the Lions, Tigers, Cats, Dogs, &c., in which the heel is raised above the ground, so that the animals walk more or less on the tips of the toes. The other two sections are the Pinnigrada and the Plantigrada (q. v.). The section Digitigrada is divided into the families Mustelidæ, Viverridæ, Canidæ, Hyenidæ, and Felidæ. The first two are aberrant, being Semiplantigrade. [SEMIPLANTIGRADA.] dig-I-ti-grād-e, a. & s. [Fr., from Lat. digitus=a toe, and gradus=a walking, a step.]

A. As adjective:

Zool.: Belonging to the Digitigrada; walking on the toes.

B. As subst.: A member of the Digitigrada; an animal which walks on its toes.

dig-I-tin, s. [English digit(alis), and suff. -in (Chem.) (q. v.).]

Chem.: The part of the alkaloid extracted from digitals which is insoluble in chloroform. It is soluble in ether, and crystallizes in needles. It is insoluble in water and in hydrochloric acid. Strong sulphuric acid dissolves digitin, forming a yellow-brown solution, which, when exposed to the air, turns a purple-red color. The addition of water turns it green. (Watts: Dict. Chem.)

dig-It-I-nērvēd, a. [Eng. digit, and nerved.]

Bot. (of the ribs of leaves): Radiating from the petiole.

dig-I-tize, v. t. [Eng. digit; -ize.]

1. To finger; to use with the fingers.

"None but the devil, besides yourself, could have digitized a pen after so scurrilous a fashion."—T. Browne: Works, ii. 211.

2. To point with the finger. (Ash.) dig-I-tō-lln, s. [DIGITIN.]

dig-I-tör-I-üm, s. [Lat. digitus=a finger.]

Music: A small portable dumb instrument, invented by M. Marks, for the purpose of strengthening and giving flexibility to the fingers for pianoforte playing. It consists of a key-board with five keys, kept in their places by springs of metal.

dig-I-tūle, s. [Latin digitulus, dimin. from digitus.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A little finger or toe.

2. Entom.: One of the hairs on the tarsus of the Mealy Bug.

dig-I-tūs, s. [Lat.]

Anat.: A finger or toe.

di-glā-dī-āte, v. t. [Lat. digladiatus, pa. par. of digladior=to fight; di=dis=apart, and gladius=a sword.] To fight, to contend, to quarrel.

"Digladiating, like Æschines and Demosthenes."—Hales: Remains, p. 42.

di-glā-dī-ā-tion, s. [Lat. digladiatio, from digladiatus.] A combat, a fight, a contest or contention.

"Aristotle seems purposely to intend the cherishing of controversial digladiations."—Glanvill: Seepsis Scientifica.

di-glē-na, s. [Greek dis=twice, twofold, and glēnē=an eyeball.]

Zool.: A genus of Rotatoria, of the family Hydratinea. Eyes two, frontal foot forked. There are no other appendages than the foot and the rotatory organ. (Griffith & Henfrey.) fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, plt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ, sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu - kw.

di-glŷph, s. [Gr. diglyphos=with double carving or indentation: dis=twice, twofold, and glyphō=to carve, to cut.]

3. To give luster to; to honor; to make illustrious, noble, or honorable; to ennoble.

"The generous motive dignifies the scar."—

Pope: Homer's Odyssey, xvii. 561.

dig-ni-fy-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DIGNIFY.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of investing with dignity or honor.

"Towards the dignifying of this office."—Mountagu: Devout Essays, pt. ii., treat. iv., § 1.

dig-nit-a-rŷ, s. [Fr. dignitaire, from Lat. dignitas=dignity (q. v.).] One who holds a position of dignity. The title is popularly used for an ecclesiastic who is invested with a dignity or benefice which gives him some preëminence over mere priests; but in strictness it is only applicable to bishops, deans, archdeacons, and some below them who hold jurisdiction.

"If there be any dignitaries, whose preferments are perhaps not liable to the accusation of superfluity, they may be persons of superior merit."—Swift.

dig-nit-ŷ, dig-net-e, dig-nit-e, ding-net-e, dig-nyt-ee, dyg-nit-e, s. [O. Fr. dignite, dignete, dignité; Fr. dignité; Prov. dignitat, dignetat; Sp. dignidad; Port. dignidade; Ital. dignità, deg-nità, from Lat. dignitatem, accus. of dignitas=worth; dignus=worthy.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Worth, nobility, worthiness, estimation.

"Of ee swithe heh stal, of ee muche dignete."—Half Meidenhad, p. 5.

2. Rank, high position, grandeur.

"Two households, both alike in dignity,"—

Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet (Prol.).

3. The importance due to rank or position.

"He had a high sense of his own personal dignity."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iv.

4. Elevation or stateliness of mien or manners.

Vain were thy dignity, and vain thy age."—

Pope: Homer's Iliad, xxiv. 253, 254.

5. Moral worth; true nobility of character; a high sense of honor and uprightness, with an utter contempt of what is mean or dishonorable.

6. Stateliness, grandeur.

"A dignity of dress adorns the great."—

Pope: Homer's Odyssey, vi. 73.

7. A high office, conferring rank in society; a position of importance, rank, or honor.

"Proud of such a dignity,"—

Shakesp.: Rape of Lucrece, 487.

*8. One who holds a high office; a dignitary.

"Likewise also these filthy dreamers . . . speak evil of dignities."—Jude 8.

*9. A maxim of general acceptance; a general principle.

"The sciences concluding from dignities, and principles known by themselves, receive not satisfaction from probable reasons."—Browne.

II. Technically:

*1. Astrol.: A certain advantage, which a Planet hath by virtue of being in such a place of the Zodiac, or such a configuration with other Planets, &c., whereby his virtue is increased and augmented. (Moron.)

*2. Eccles.: Properly that promotion or perferment to which any jurisdiction is annexed, but commonly used for any high position in the Church.

*3. Rhet.: One of the three parts of elocution, consisting in the right use of tropes and figures.

¶ For the difference between dignity and honor, see HONOR.

dig-nōs-ce, v. t. [Lat. dignosco.] To distinguish, to discriminate, to determine.

"Who all have power to dignosce and tak cognitiounne whidder the same fallis within the said act of pacificationne."—Acts Chas. I. (ed. 1814), v. 342.

dig-nōs-tic, s. [DIAGNOSTIC.] An indication, a distinguishing mark.

dig-nō-tion, s. [Lat. dignosco, dignotum=to distinguish: di=dis=apart, and gnosco, nosco=to know.] A distinction; a distinguishing mark or characteristic.

"That temperamental dignotations, and conjecture of prevalent humors, may be collected from spots in our nails, we are not averse to concede."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

di-gōn-ōūs, a. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and gonia=an angle.]

Bot.: Having two angles.

di-grām, s. [Greek di=dis=twice, twofold, and gramma=a writing, a letter.] The same as DIGRAPH (q. v.).

di-grāph, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and graphē=a writing, a figure.] A combination of two vowels or two consonants to represent one simple sound; a double sign for a simple sound.

di-grāph-ic, a. [Eng. diagraph; -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a digraph.

"Cases of the arbitrary use of consonants as diagraphic modifiers also occur."—H. Sweet, in Trans. Philological Society (1873-4), p. 485.

di-grēss, v. i. [Lat. digressus, pa. par. of digredior: di=dis=apart, and gradior=to walk, to go.]

I. Lit.: To go or turn aside from the right or direct path; to deviate.

"Moreover she beginneth to digresse in latitude, and to diminish her motion from the morne rising."—Holland: Plinie, bk. ii., ch. 17.

II. Figuratively:

*1. To go or turn aside from the path of duty; to transgress, to deviate from the right, to offend.

"Thy abundant goodness shall excuse
The deadly blot on thy digressing son."—

Shakesp.: Richard II., v. 3.

*2. To wander, to depart, to swerve.

"Digressing from the valor of a man."

Shakesp.: Romeo and Juliet, iii. 3.

3. To wander from the subject or question; to depart or deviate from the main point or design of a discourse.

"It seemeth (to digress no farther) that the Tartarians spreading so far, cannot be the Israelites."—Brewerwood: Enquiries.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to digress and to deviate: "Both in the original and the accepted sense, these words express going out of the ordinary course; but digress is used only in particular, and deviate in general cases. We digress only in a narrative whether written or spoken; we deviate in actions as well as in words, in our conduct as well as in writings. Digress is mostly taken in a good or indifferent sense; deviate in an indifferent or bad sense. Although frequent digressions are faulty, yet occasionally it is necessary to digress for the purposes of explanation; every deviation is bad, which is not sanctioned by the necessity of circumstances." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) di-grēss, s. [DIGRESS, v.] A digression.

"Nor let any censure this a digress from my history."—Fuller: Church History, bk. xi., ch. x., § 43.

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. Lit.: A deviation or wandering from the direct course.

"The digression of the sun is not equal; but, near the equinoctial intersections, it is right and greater; near the solstices, more oblique and lesser."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

*2. Figuratively:

(1) A deviation or wandering from the path of virtue; a transgression, an offense.

"Then my digression is so vile, so base,
That it will live engraven in my face."—

Shakesp.: Rape of Lucrece, 202, 203.

(2) A wandering or departing from the main point or subject of a discourse, argument, or narration.

"Digression is so much in modern use."

Cowper: Conversation, 855.

(3) That part of a discourse, &c., which wanders from the main point or subject, though still having some connection with it.

"To content and fill the eye of the understanding, the best authors sprinkle their works with pleasing digressions, with which they recreate the minds of their readers."—Dryden.

(4) Anything irrelevant.

"The good man thought so much of his late conceived commonwealth that all other matters were but digressions to him."—Sidney.

II. Astron.: The apparent distance of the inferior planets, Mercury and Venus, from the sun. The greatest digression of the former is 28°, and of the latter 47½°.

di-grēs-sion-al, a. [Eng. digression; -al.] Of or pertaining to a digression; of the nature of a digression.

"Milton has judiciously avoided Fletcher's digressional ornaments."—Warton: Notes on Milton.

di-grēs-sive, a. [Fr. digressif; Ital. digressivo; Sp. digresivo.] Digressing; of the nature of a digression.

"The digressive sallies of imagination would have been compressed and restrained by confinement of rhyme."—Johnson: Lives of the Poets, Young.

di-grēs-sive-ly, adv. [Eng. digressive; -ly.] By way of digression.

digue, s. [Fr.] A sea-wall or breakwater. An artificial construction opposing a barrier to the sea or preventing the denudation of the land thereby. [DIKE.]

Prosody: A foot consisting of two iambuses (—v—v—).

di-i-ōd, in compos. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and Eng., &c., iod (ine) (q. v.).]

Chem.: Compounds in which two atoms of hydrogen have been replaced by two atoms of iodine.

di-i-ō-dide, s. [Pref. di=twice, twofold, and Eng., &c., iodide (q. v.).]

Chem.: A compound of two atoms of iodine with a dyad element or radical, as mercuric diiodide, HgI_2 . Also called Binioidide.

di-i-sō-pēnt-yl, s. [DECYL HYDRIDE.]

di-jū-di-cant, s. [Lat. dijudicans, pr. par. of dijudico.] One who decides or adjudicates on a question.

"Many things which popular dijudicans hold as certain as their creeds."—Glanvill: Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. xxiii.

di-jū-di-cāte, v. i. [Lat. dijudicatus, pa. par. of dijudico: di=dis=apart, and judico=to judge, to decide.] To decide, to determine, to adjudicate.

"The church of Rome, when she commands unto us the authority of the church in dijudicating of scriptures, seems only to speak of herself."—Hales: Remains, p. 260.

di-jū-di-cāt-ēd, pa. par. or a. [DIJUDICATE.]

di-jū-di-cāt-līg, pr. par., a. & s. [DIJUDICATE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of judging, determining, or deciding; dijudication.

di-jū-di-cā-tion, s. [Lat. dijudicatio, from dijudicatus.]

2. Law: Judicial distinction. (Wharton.)

dī-kā, s. [A native West African word.]

dika-bread, s.

Chem.: A vegetable substance, somewhat resembling cocoa, prepared from the fruit of Mangifera gabonensis, a tree growing abundantly on the West Coast of Africa, from Sierra Leone to the Gaboon. The fruit, which is about the size of a swan's egg, contains a white almond. These almonds when coarsely bruised and warm-pressed, form dika-bread, which has a gray color with white spots, smells like roasted flour and cocoa, and has an agreeable, somewhat bitter, and astringent taste, and is greasy to the touch. It is a valuable article of food, and is used abundantly by the natives. (Watts: Dict. Chem.) dike, dic, dyke, s. [A. S. dic; cogn. with Dut. dijk; Icel. diki; Dan. dige; Sw. dike; M. H. Ger. teich; Ger. teich, all=a dike; Gr. teichos=a wall (Skeat). Ditch is merely a softened form of dike. Cf. pouch and poke, stitch and stick.] [DIG, DITCH, DIGUE.]

1. Ordinary Language:

1. A ditch; a channel for water made by digging; a moat.

"About the castle was a dyke."

Richard Cœur de Lion, 6, 621.

2. A mound or dam of stones, earth, sand, &c., raised to protect low-lying lands from being flooded by the sea or a river.

"Dikes that the hands of the farmers had raised."

Longfellow: Evangeline, i. 1.

3. A wall or fence, whether of turf or stone. (Scotch.)

"The gentlemen have begun to inclose with stone dykes, or walls."—P. Craig: Forfars. Stat. Acc., ii. 498.

II. Technically:

1. Geol.: A wall-like mass of cooled and hardened volcanic or igneous rock, which when hot and a fluid penetrated into a rent or fissure in the sedimentary strata. As a rule, to which, however, there are not a few exceptions, the volcanic material is harder than the sedimentary rocks into which it has intruded itself. In many cases these have been Basaltic Dikes, Rathlin Island, Antrim.

d. Dikes. m. Chalk converted into Granular Marble. c. Chalk.

is now everywhere used. Geologists employ it even when the line of volcanic material does not rise above the sedimentary strata. A dike is analogous to a vein, but is on a larger scale, and does not ramify to the same extent as a vein. Recent dikes are seen in Vesuvius and Etna. They are formed by the filling up of open fissures with liquid lava. Exactly similar appearances are presented amid the extinct volcanoes of Auvergne in France, in Scotland, in St. Helena, and in other places. Sometimes, as in St. Helena, they have a vitreous selvage. (Lyell.)

2. Mining: A non-metallic wall of mineral matter occupying a former fissure in rock, intercepting and disturbing the order of ore-bearing strata.

dike-grave, s. An officer appointed to look after the dikes in marshy countries like Holland, &c.

"The chief Dike-grave here is one of the greatest officers of trust in all the province."—Howell: Letters, p. 8.

dike-leaper, dyke-louper, s.

(2) A state of decay.

"The state of dilapidation into which a great empire must fall."—Burke: Nabob of Arcot's Debts.

(3) Peculation.

II. Eng. Ecc. Law: The act of an incumbent in suffering the chancel, parsonage-house, and other buildings thereto belonging, to go to ruin or decay, whether such dilapidation is voluntary, that is, by pulling down any part of the buildings; or passive, that is, by neglecting to keep them in repair. Dilapidations also extend to any willful waste in or upon the glebe-woods, or any other inheritance of the Church. For such acts an action lies either in the spiritual court by the canon law, or in the courts of common law, and it may be brought by the successor against the predecessor, if living, or, if dead, then against his executors.

"Tis the duty of all churchwardens to prevent the dilapidations of the chancel and mansion-house belonging to the rector or vicar."—Ayliffe: Farergon.

di-lāp-l-dā-tōr, s. [English dilapidat(e); -or.] One who causes or suffers dilapidations.

"The late bishop, a monstrous dilapidator of that see."—Strype: Life of Parker.

"This little golden thread Dilates into a column high and vast."
Longfellow: Sand of the Desert.

2. Fig.: To speak fully and copiously; to enlarge, to descant; followed by on or upon.

"To dilate upon it, and improve their luster, by any addition or eloquence of speech."—Clarendon.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to dilate and to expand: "The idea of drawing anything out so as to occupy a greater space is common to these terms, in opposition to contracting. . . . A bladder dilates on the admission of air, or the heart dilates with joy; knowledge expands the mind, or a person's views expand with circumstances. In the circulation of the blood through the body, the vessels are exposed to a perpetual dilatation and contraction; the gradual expansion of the mind by the regular modes of communicating knowledge to youth is unquestionably to be desired; but the sudden expansion of a man's thoughts from a comparative state of ignorance by any powerful action is very dangerous." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

*di-lā-te, a. [Lat. dilatus.] Extended, enlarged, expanded, wide.

"Whom they out of their bounty have instructed With so dilate and absolute a power."
B. Jonson: Sejanus, i. 2.

di-lēm-ma, s. [Lat., from Greek dilemma=a double proposition, one in which a person is caught between two difficulties; dialambanomai=to be caught between: di=between, and lambanō=to catch.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II.

2. A difficult or doubtful choice or position; a position in which difficulties or evils appear to present themselves on every side, so that there seems to be no way to escape; an awkward predicament.

"A refusal of supplies at Edinburgh reduced him to no such dilemma."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

II. Logic: An argument in which the adversary is caught between two difficulties, by having a choice of alternatives, each of which is fatal to his cause.

"A young rhetorician applied to an old sophist to be taught the art of pleading, and bargained for a certain reward, to be paid when he should gain a cause. The master sued for his reward, and the scholar endeavored to elude his claim by a dilemma: If I gain my cause, I shall withhold your pay, because the judge's award will be against you; if I lose it, I may withhold it because I shall not yet have gained a cause. On the contrary, says the master, if you gain your cause, you must pay me, because you are to pay me when you gain a cause; if you lose it, you must pay me, because the judge will award it."—Johnson.

¶ The horns of a dilemma: The alternatives presented to an adversary in a dilemma, the choice of either of which is fatal to his cause; a position of extreme difficulty, from which there appears to be no way of escape.

*di-lēm-mæd, a. [Eng. dilemma; -ed.] Placed in a dilemma.

di-lēt-tant-ism, s. [Eng. dilettant(e); -ism.]

The characteristics or manners of a dilettanti; a desultory, affected, or amateurish pursuit or cultivation of art, science, or literature.

"The age of finical dilettantism and emasculated elegance . . . soon afterward followed."—Hall: Modern English, p. 147.

*diligh-en, *dilighen, v. t. [A. S. dilegian, dilgian; O. H. Ger. dilgōn.] To destroy, to abolish.

"Forr swa to . . . cristeas laghness dilghenn."—Ormulum, 5,300.

di-l-y-gence, *di-l-y-gen-çy, s. [Fr., from Lat. diligentia, from diligo=to love; Sp. & Port. diligencia; Ital. diligenza. A moral lesson is in the etymology of this word. One can never permanently exhibit diligence unless he loves his work; hence, when practicable, he should choose the work for which he is best adapted by nature, and diligence in which will be to him a comparatively easy task.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Steady application or assiduity in any business or task; industry, assiduity.

"I have followed him everywhere . . . I am sure with diligence enough."—Dryden: Letter to Sir H. Howard.

2. Care, heedfulness.

"Keep thy heart with all diligence."—Prov. iv. 23.

II. Technically:

1. Law: The law recognizes three degrees of diligence: (a) Low or slight, which persons of little or no prudence take of their own concerns; (b) Common or ordinary, which men of an average type exercise; (c) High or great, which persons of exceptional prudence take. The Civil Law is in conformity with the Common Law in recognizing these three grades. (Wharton.)

2. Vehicles: A French stage coach. It was the national vehicle on the regular routes; had four wheels, two compartments, a deck, and a dickey; was drawn by from four to seven horses, and managed by a postilion.

"... the beggars, whom he had been accustomed to see . . . pursuing a diligence up hill."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xvii.

di-l-y-gent, a. [Fr. diligent; Ital. Sp., & Port. diligento, from Lat. diligens, pr. par. of diligo=to love, delight in: di=dis=apart, between, and lego=to choose.]

1. Of persons: Constant and steady in application to any business or task; assiduous, persevering, persistent, industrious; sedulous; not idle or negligent.

"... those honest, diligent and God-fearing yeomen."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

Diligence.

bōl, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çeil, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, ag; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -die, &c. = bēl, dēl.

2. Of things: Prosecuted, or applied with diligence and care; careful, assiduous, painstaking.

"And the judges shall make diligent inquisition."—Deut. xix. 18.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between diligent, expeditious, and prompt: "Diligent, from diligo, to love, marks the interest one takes in doing something; he is diligent who loses no time, who keeps close to the work. Expeditious, from the Latin expeditio, to dispatch, marks the desire one has to complete the thing begun. He who is expeditious applies himself to no other thing that offers; he finishes everything in its turn. Prompt, from the Latin promoveo, to draw out or make ready, marks one's desire to get ready; he is prompt who works with spirit so as to make things ready. Idleness, dilatoriness, and slowness are the three defects opposed to these three qualities. The diligent man has no reluctance in commencing the labor; the expeditious man never leaves it; the prompt man brings it quickly to an end. It is necessary to be diligent in the concerns which belong to us, to be expeditious in any business that requires to be terminated, to be prompt in the execution of orders that are given to us." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between diligent and sedulous, see SEDULOUS.

dil-l-gent-lŷ, *dil-l-gen-ly, *dil-l-gent-liche, adv. [Eng. diligent; -ly.] With diligence, assiduity, and steady application; carefully, industriously, sedulously.

Min.: A variety of chrysocolla, containing a slight admixture of carbonate of copper.

dil-lên-ŭ-ŭs, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. dillen(ia), and Lat. fem. adj. pl. suff. -æe.]

Bot.: One of the tribes into which the order Dilleniaceae is divided, the other being Delimæe (q. v.). The Dilleneæ have the connective of the anthers equal or narrow at the point. They occur in Asia and Australia. (Lindley.)

dil-lê-nŭ-ŭ, s. [Named after J. J. Dillenius, a professor of Botany at Oxford.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, the typical one of the order Dilleniaceae. They are lofty forest trees, natives of tropical Asia. Dillenia pentagyna furnishes excellent spars for ships; and the fruit of D. indica is edible, though very acid. It is used by the natives in India in curries and jellies, and the acid juice sweetened with sugar forms a cooling drink. The leaves of D. scabrella are very rough, and are used instead of sandpaper.

dil-lê-nŭ-ŭ-ŭ-ŭ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. dilleni(a), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ææe.]

Bot.: An order of plants found chiefly in Australia, Asia, and the warm parts of America. They are nearly related to the Ranunculaceae. Sepals five, persistent; petals five, deciduous, in a single row; seeds universally arillate; stamens indefinite, hypogynous. The species are trees, shrubs, or under-shrubs. The Indian species are remarkable for their beauty, the grandeur of their foliage, and the magnificence of their flowers. They have astringent properties, and some of the species afford excellent timber. Lindley enumerated twenty-six genera, comprising 200 species.

dil-lên-ŭ-ŭ-ŭ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. dilleni(a), and Eng. suff. -ææe.]

Bot.: The English name given by Lindley to the order Dilleniaceae.

dil-lŭ-grôut, s. [Etym. doubtful. Cf. grout, s.] Potage made for the king's table on his coronation-day. Some lands were held of him in serjeanty by the tenure of furnishing such potage for the above-named great occasion. (Wharton.)

dill-ŭng, s. [Prob. from Icel. dilla=to lull.] A darling, a favorite, a pet.

"To make up the match with my eldest daughter, my wife's dilling, whom she longs to call madam."—Eastward Hoe, i. 1.

di-māg-net-ite, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. magnetite (q. v.).]

Min.: A magnetite pseudomorph from Monroe, Orange Co., N. Y. (Dana.)

dim-ar-is, s. [A word of no etymology.]

Logic: An arbitrary name for a mode of syllogisms in the fourth figure, in which the Middle Term is the predicate of the Major and the subject of the Minor Premise. This figure is the most awkward and unnatural of all, and is the direct reverse of the first. Taking X to represent the Major term, Z the Minor, and Y the Middle, this syllogism may be expressed thus: Some X is Y; all Y is Z; ∴ Some Z is X. For example:

(dim) Some men are Americans.

(Ar) All Americans are mortal.

(Is) Some mortals are men.

*dim-ble, s. [Probably connected with dimple (q. v.).] A dell, a dingle; a bower.

"Deep in a gloomy dimble she doth dwell."

di-mēn-sion-ā-l, a. [Eng. dimension; -al.] Relating to dimensions.

*[Dimensional equations: They are such as the following: The dimensions of acceleration are length (time)²; the dimensions of the unit of acceleration are $\frac{\text{unit of length}}{(\text{unit of time})^2}$. Or (more shortly) velocity = $\frac{\text{length}}{\text{time}}$; acceleration = $\frac{\text{velocity}}{\text{time}} = \frac{\text{length}}{(\text{time})^2}$. (Everett: The C. G. S. System of Units (1875), ch. i., p. 4.

di-mēn-sion-ed, *di-men-cloned, a. [Eng. dimension; -ed.] Having dimensions. (Seldom found except in composition.)

"He would els [have] been invisible with all his dimensioned body under the form of breade."—The Supper of the Lord (1533), B 3.

*di-mēn-sion-less, *di-mēn-tion-less, a. [Eng. dimension; -less.]

1. Devoid of size or dimensions; without size; hence insignificantly small.

"As the earth is but a point compared to the orb of Saturn, so the orb of Saturn itself grows dimensionless when compared with that vast extent of space."—Warburton: Works, vol. ix., serm. 2.

2. Without any definite shape or form.

"In they pass'd Dimensionless through heavenly doors."

Milton: P. L., xi. 16, 17.

*di-mēn-s-i-ty, s. [Formed on the analogy of immensity (q. v.).] Extent, capacity.

*2. Weakened, impaired.

II. Technically:

1. Music: Lessened by a semitone.

(1) Diminished intervals are those made less than minor, e. g.: G sharp to F sharp is a diminished 7th, because G to F being a minor 7th, G sharp to F contains one semitone less than the minor interval. Some authors, however, apply this term in a manner liable to lead to much confusion, namely, to a perfect interval when made smaller by one semitone, and to an imperfect interval when made less by two semitones; thus, according to them, c to G flat is a diminished 5th, but c to E double flat, or c to G sharp to E flat, a diminished 3d. [INTERVAL.]

(2) Diminished subjects or counter-subjects are subjects or counter-subjects introduced with notes half the value of those in which they were first enunciated.

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of diminishing, lessening, or reducing in size or quality; a subtracting from.

"Reading doth convey to the mind that truth, without addition or diminution, which Scripture hath derived from the Holy Ghost."—Hooker: Ecc. Pol., bk. v., ch. xxii., § 6.

2. The state of becoming or appearing less or smaller.

"Their intellects suffer an equal diminution with their prosperity."—Goldsmith: On Polite Learning, ch. ii.

*3. A discredit; a loss of dignity; a degradation; a disgrace.

"Heroic laurel'd Eugene yields the prime; Nor thinks it diminution to be rank'd In military honor next."—Philips.

*4. A deprivation of or lowering of dignity.

"They might raise the reputation of another, though they are a diminution to his."—Addison: Spectator.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: The gradual decrease in the diameter of the shaft of a column from the base to the capital. The shafts are diminished as they rise, sometimes from the foot itself of the shaft, sometimes from one-quarter, and sometimes from one-third of the height. The diminution at top is seldom less than one-eighth or more than one-sixth of the inferior diameter of the column. [ENTASIN.] In Gothic architecture neither swell nor diminution is used, all the horizontal sections being similar and equal.

2. Her.: The defacing of some particular point in the escutcheon.

3. Law: An omission in some part of the proceedings, or in the record, which is certified in a writ of error on the part of either of the parties to the suit.

di-morph'-ism, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold; morphē=form, and Eng. suff. -ism.]

1. Crystallog.: The power of assuming or crystallizing in two distinct forms. Sulphur, for instance, which usually crystallizes in the rhombic system, when melted, may form monoclinohedric crystals. This property has been explained by its discoverer on the principle that the form and, with it, the other physical characters of a body, depend not merely on the chemical nature of the atoms, but also on their relative position. Hence the same chemical substance may form two or even more distinct bodies or mineral species. Thus carbon in one form is the diamond, in another graphite; and carbonate of lime appears as calc-spar or as aragonite. Even the temperature at which a substance crystallizes influences its forms, and so far its composition, as seen in aragonite, Glauber salt, borax, &c. (Page, &c.)

2. Zool.: A difference of form between members of the same species.

"We have here a curious and inexplicable case of dimorphism, for some of the females of four European species of Dytiscus, and of certain species of Hydroporus, have 'their elytra smooth; and no intermediate gradations between sulcated or punctured and quite smooth elytra have been observed.'"—Darwin: Descent of Man (1871), ch. x., p. 343 (Note).

3. Bot.: A state in which two forms of flower are produced by the same species.

di-morph'-ite, di-morph'-ine, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold; morphē=form, figure, and Eng. suff. -ite, -ine (Min.). (q. v.).]

Min.: An orthorhombic fragile mineral of two types. It is of an orange or saffron-yellow color, translucent or transparent. Specific gravity 3.58; hardness 1.5. Composition: Sulphur, 24.55; arsenic, 75.45=100. (Dana.)

di-morph'-ō-dōn, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold; morphē=form, and odon (genit. odontos)=a tooth.]

Palæont.: A genus of Pterosauria, or flying reptiles, in which the anterior teeth are large and pointed, the posterior teeth small and lancet-shaped.

di-morph'-ōūs, a. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold; morphē=form, and Eng. adj. suff. -ous.]

1. Crystallog.: Applied to a chemical substance which crystallizes into two distinct forms.

"How should we know that sulphur is dimorphous without resort to the crucible?"—S. Higley, in Cassell's Popular Educator, pt. ii., p. 358.

2. Bot. & Zool.: Characterized by or exhibiting dimorphism.

dim'-ple, s. [A nasalized form of dipple, a dimin. from dip (q. v.); hence=a little depression or dip. (Skeat.)] [DIMBLE.]

1. A little depression or hollow.

" . . . garring the very stane-and-time wa's dingle wi' his screechings."—Scott: Waverley, ch. xlv.

dīn-gō, s. [A native word.]

Zool.: Canis dingo, the Australian dog, an animal of a wolf-like appearance. It is, in all probability, not a true native of the island, but an importation. It is remarkable as being the only mammal not belonging to the group of Marsupials (Kangaroos, Wombats, &c.) found in the island. It approaches the Shepherd's Dog in appearance: the head is elongated, the forehead flat, and the ears short and erect, or slightly inclined forward. The body is thickly covered with hair of two kinds—the one woolly and gray, the other silky and of a deep yellow or fawn color. It seldom barks or growls if irritated, but erects the hairs of its whole body like bristles, and becomes furious. Owing to the ravages committed by it among sheep, endeavors have been made to exterminate the race, and it is now only to be found in the interior of the island.

din-gŭ, a. [Eng. dingy; -y.]

1. Dirty, soiled.

2. Of a dusky, soiled, or dun color; faded.

Zool.: A family of Infusoria. It contains two genera, Dinobryon and Epipyxis.

dī-nō-brŷ-ōn, s. [DINOBRŪIDE.]

Zool.: A genus of Infusoria, the typical one of the family Dinobryidae. It is distinguished from Epipyxis by an interior red eye-spot and a flagelliform filament. There are four species.

dī-nōq-ēr-as, s. [Gr. deinos=terrible, and keras=a horn, pl. kerata.]

Palæont.: A genus of Mammalia, order Dinocerata (q. v.).

dī-nō-çēr-a-tē, s. pl. [Pl. of Mod. Lat. dinoceras (q. v.).]

Palæont.: An order of Mammalia having on each of the four feet five well-developed toes, each terminated by a hoof. Proboscis absent (?). Three horn cores. No upper incisors; upper canines assuming the form of long tusks directed downward. The species are large mammals from the Eocene of North America. Prof. Cope ranks the Dinocerata as an aberrant group of Ungulata, while Prof. Marsh considers them a distinct order intermediate between the Perissodactyle Ungulata and the Proboscidea. (Nicholson.)

dī-nō-çhār-is, s. [Gr. deinos=dreadful, and charis=grace, pleasure.]

Zool.: A genus of Rotatoria, belonging to the family Eucharidota. They have a single cervical eye; foot forked; carapace closed beneath, and without teeth at the end; jaws with one (or two?) teeth each; two horns at the base of the foot. There are three species. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

din-ōm-ic, a. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and nomos=a pasture, a region.]

Bot.: A term applied to a group of plants which occurs in two of the six great divisions of the globe. (Balfour: Botany, § 1151.)

din-ōph-is, s. [Gr. deinos=strange, dreadful, and ophis=a snake.]

Palæont.: A genus of Ophidia, formed for the reception of a gigantic constricting serpent from the Tertiary rocks of the United States.

din-ōph-ŷ-sis, s. [Gr. deinos=strange, dreadful, and physis=nature.]

Zool.: A genus of Infusoria belonging to the family Peridinina. They are marine. There extends down the body a folded crest or fringe, like that of Stentor, except that it is a part of the carapace. A crown of cilia exists round the neck, and a longer flagelliform filament. They are found in sea-water with luminous animals, and are probably themselves luminous. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

dī-nor-nī-dæ, dī-nor-nīth-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. dinornis (is), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -i-dæ.]

Ornith.: A family of fossil birds found in New Zealand, and believed to be akin to the Struthionidae, or Ostriches, though by some parted between the Struthionidae and the Wang Birds. They belong to the sub-class Ratitæ. Chief genera, Dinornis and Palapteryx. The natives called these birds Moas. They have the wings useless for flight, their place, however, being supplied by strong cursorial feet. They occur in the Post-Tertiary of Recent deposits in New Zealand. Type, Dinornis (q. v.). [MOA.]

dī-nor-nīs, del-nor-nīs, s. [Greek deinos=strange, unusual . . . fearful, terrible, dreadful, and ornis=a bird.]

Ornith.: A genus of fossil birds, founded by Prof. Owen, and published by him in Nov., 1839, with much sagacity, on the authority of the fragment of a femur brought from New Zealand. Subsequent discoveries have brought to light several species of Dinornis, and some allied genera. Dinornis giganteus was from ten to eleven or twelve feet high, or one-third higher than the tallest ostrich; D. struthionides was seven feet, or the height of an ostrich of moderate size; D. dromioides five feet, or that of the emu; and D. didiformis four feet, or between the cassowary and the dodo. The Maories say that these birds co-existed with their ancestors, and bones, with the fragment of an egg-shell apparently burnt, found by Mr. Walter Mantell, seem to confirm the belief. (Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., iv. 225-241; vi. 319-342, &c.)

Dinornis.

dī-nō-saur, *dei-nō-saur, s. [DINOSAURIA.] A member of the sub-order Dinosauria.

" . . . in the Dinosaur it may be a question."—Huxley, in Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., xxvi. (1870), 27.

dī-nō-sau-ri-a, *dei-nō-sau-ri-a, s. pl. [Gr. deinos=strange, unnatural, . . . fearful, terrible, dreadful, and sauros, or saura=a lizard.]

Palæont.: A tribe or sub-order of Reptiles established by Herman von Meyer in 1832, and subsequently called by him Pachypodes, or Pachypoda. In 1841 Professor Owen gave them the name which they still retain, Dinosauria. Huxley places them as one of two sub-orders under his order Ornithoscelida [ORNITHOSCELIDA], and thus defines them: Cervical vertebrae short, femur as long as or longer than the tibia. Huxley divides them into three families: the Megalosauridae, the Scelidosauridae, and the Iguanodontidae (q. v.). (Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., xxvi. (1870), 1-51.)

dī-nō-sau-ri-an, *dei-nō-sau-ri-an, a. & s. [Mod. Lat. dinosauria (a), and Eng. adj. suff. -an.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining or belonging to the Dinosauria.

" . . . a thoroughly dinosaurian aspect."—Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., xxiv. 48.

B. As subst.: A member of the sub-order Dinosauria. (Owen: Report on British Fossil Reptiles, 1841.)

dī-nō-thēr-i-ām, *dī-nō-thēr-e, s. [Gr. deinos=terrible, and thērion=a beast, a wild animal.]

Palæont.: A genus of fossil mammals belonging to the order Proboscidea (Kaup, Huxley, &c.), or to the order Cetacea, and the sub-order Sirenia (Blainville, Pictet, Carpenter, Dallas, &c.). The Dinotherium giganteum, of which the entire skull and lower jaws were found in Miocene sand at Eppelsheim on the Rhine by Klipstein, and were described by Kaup, was apparently larger than the elephant. Its tusks, which projected from the lower jaw, curved downward, and were used by the animal, which was semi-aquatic, to support its head upon the shore. It is believed that it had a short flexible trunk. Cuvier had described some teeth of this species as those of a gigantic Tapir. No body or limb bones have yet been found so associated with those of the skull as to show that they belonged to the same animal. Hence the true position of the Dinotherium has not been satisfactorily determined.

din-ōx-ide, s. [DIOXIDE.]

din-sōme, a. [Eng. din; -some.] Noisy, dinning.

dint, *dent, *dunt, *dynt, *dyntte, s. [A. S. dynt; cogn. with Icel. dynt=a dint, dynta=to dint; Sw. dial. dunt=a stroke, dunta=to strike.]

I. Literally:

1. A blow, a stroke.

"At a dint he slow them thro."—Havelok, 1, 807.

2. The mark, dent, or indentation caused by and remaining after a blow.

"From Kabibonokka's forehead,
From his now-be sprinkled tresses,
Drops of sweat fell fast and heavy,
Making dints upon the ashes."

Longfellow: Song of Hiawatha, li.

II. Figuratively:

1. A blow, a calamity.

"Thurh Adamees gilltess dintt, Wass all mannkin thurhwundedd."

Ormulum, 4, 290.

2. Power, force.

"O, now you weep; and, I perceive, you feel
The dint of pity."

Shakesp.: Julius Cæsar, iii. 2.

¶ By dint of: By means of, by the power or force of.

"Alone able to make these discoveries by dint of reason."—Bolingbroke: Essays, iii.; Monothelism.

dint, *dunten, *dynt, v. t. & i. [DYNT, s.]

A. Transitive:

*1. To beat, to strike, to drive with blows.

"Dunt the devels thider in."

Metrical Homilies, p. xii.

2. To make a dint, indentation, or hollow in; to dent.

"There's blood upon that dinted sword,
A stain its steel can never lose."

Byron: The Giaour.

3. To impress deeply.

"Fall foul the hand which bends the steel Around the courser's thundering heel;
That e'er shall dint a sable wound
On fair Glamorgan's velvet ground."

Scott: Norman Horseshoe, i.

*B. Intrans.: To strike, to beat, to hit.

"Doughtly dyntand on mules and on steds."
Tomeley Mysteries, p. 234.

dint'-əd, pa. par. or a. [DINT.]

dint'-līg, pr. par., a. & s. [DINT, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of striking, beating, or indenting.

dint'-less, a. [Eng. dint; -less.] Without, or free from any dints.

"Veiling with hushed softness its dintless rocks."—Ruskin.

*di-nā-mēr-ā-tion, s. [Lat. dinumeratio, from dinumeratus, pa. par. of dinumero=to count up.] The act of numbering or counting out singly.

di-ōc'-ē-sān, a. & s. [Fr. diocésain; Sp. & Ital. diocesano; Port. diocesano, from Low Lat. diocesanus.] [DIOCESE.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to a diocese.

B. As substantive:

1. One who has ecclesiastical jurisdiction over a diocese; the bishop of a diocese. The term diocesan is more limited than bishop, the latter including all the peculiar functions of the episcopate, while the former has reference only to the bounds in which these functions shall be exercised.

2. (Pl.): Clergy having any dignity in a diocese.

diocesan court, s.

Eccles.: A consistorial or consistory.

di-ō-cēse, *di-o-cise, *di-o-cyse, s. [French diocèse; Lat. diocesis, from Gr. diōkēsis=house-keeping, administration; diōkeō=to keep house, to manage; di=diā=through, and oikēō=to inhabit; oikos=a house; Port. diocese; Ital. & Sp. diocesi.]

1. The territorial district or portion of the Church forming the spiritual jurisdiction of a bishop.

2. A division, a district, a province.

¶ Even as early as the New Testament history we find some plain indications of the rise of the diocesan system, in the cases respectively of James, Bishop of Jerusalem; Timothy, Bishop of Ephesus; Titus, of Crete; to whom may be added the Angels or Bishops of the Seven Churches in Asia. These were resident in cities, and had jurisdiction over the churches and inferior clergy in those cities, and probably in the country adjacent. To these episcopal districts or bishoprics the name of Diocese was not given till the beginning of the fourth century. Previously to that period they were denominated Parochia.

¶ For the difference between diocese and bishopric, see BISHOPRIC.

*di-ō-cēse-nēr, s. [DIOCESE.] One who belongs to a diocese.

*di-ō-cēss, s. [DIOCESE.]

di-ōc'-lē-ā (pl. di-ōc'-lē-æ), s. [Named after Diocles Carystinus, an ancient Greek botanist.]

Botany:

1. Sing.: A genus of papilionaceous plants, the typical one of the sub-tribe Diocleæ (q. v.).

2. Pl. (Diocleæ): A sub-tribe of papilionaceous plants, tribe Phaseolæ.

Di-ō-clē'-tīan, s. & a. [Lat. Diocletianus.]

A. As subst.: The name of one of the Roman emperors, proclaimed at Chalcedon, in A. D. 284. In his reign took place one of the sternest attempts at suppression of the Christians. He was originally a private soldier. He resigned the sovereignty in A. D. 305, and died nine years after.

B. As adj.: (See the compounds.)

Diocletian era, s.

Chron.: An era used by Christian writers until the introduction of the Christian era in the sixth century, and still employed by the Abyssinians and Copts. It dates from the day on which Diocletian was proclaimed Emperor (August 29, 284), and is also called the Era of Martyrs, from the execution of Christians in the last year of his reign.

Diocletian window, s.

Arch.: A Venetian window.

di-ōc'-ta-hē-dral, a. [Gr. di=dis=twice, two-fold, and Eng. octahedral (q. v.).]

Crystallog.: Having the form of an octahedral prism with tetrahedral summits.

di-ōd'-ī-ā, s. [Gr. di=diā=through, across, and hodos=a way.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, consisting of trailing shrubs or herbs, with small white flowers, natural order Rubiaceæ. They are natives of the warm parts of this country and of Africa. The name is derived from many of the species growing by the roadside.

di-ō-dōn, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and odon (genit. odontos)=a tooth.]

Ichthy.: A genus of teleostean fish, family Gymnodontes, order Plectognathi, deriving their name from the fact that the ivory-clad terminations of the jaws show no suture, and the fish thus appear to possess but two teeth. The body, as in other members of the family, can be inflated with air till the creature floats on the surface of the water under side uppermost; it is likewise covered with ossifications in the skin, each with a pair of lateral roots and a stiff, movable, erectile spine. The roundness of these fish when distended has earned for them the name of Globe-fish, or Prickly Globe-fish (Orbes épineux of the French), in addition to the designations Porcupine-fish and Sea Hedgehog, suggested by the numerous spines. The four species of Diodon are found in all the seas between the Tropics, and range to the Cape of Good Hope. The largest species (Diodon hystrix) attains the length of two feet six inches. The food of Diodon consists of crustaceans and sea-weeds, for the trituration of which its jaws are admirably adapted. This genus has by some naturalists been made the type of a family Diodontidæ.

di-ō-dōn-tī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. diodon; t connective, and Lat. fem. adj. pl. suff. -idæ.]

Ichthy.: A family of fishes, of which Diodon is the type. It belongs to the order Teleostea, and the sub-order Plectognatha.

di-ō'-cī-ā, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and oikos=a house.]

Bot.: The twenty-second class in the Linnæan system. It comprehends those plants which have the stamiferous and pistilliferous flowers on separate individuals.

di-ō'-cī-ous, di-ō'-cī-an, a. [Mod. Lat. diœc(i)a, and Eng. adj. suff. -ous, -ian.]

1. Bot.: A term applied to unisexual plants, such as the willow and the hemp, in which the stamiferous and pistilliferous flowers are on separate individuals.

"Monœcious and diœcious plants are produced by the suppression of the essential organs of the flowers."—Balfour: Botany, § 648.

2. Zool.: A term applied to those animals in which the sexes are distinct: that is, those in which the ovum is produced by one individual (female) and the spermatozoid by another (male). It is opposed to Monœcious (q. v.).

di-ō'-cī-ōūs-lŷ, adv. [English diœcious (q. v.); -ly.]

Bot.: In a diœcious manner; having stamens or pistils in different plants.

diœciously-hermaphrodite, a.

Bot.: Hermaphrodite, but yet not having perfect stamens and pistil in any one individual flower.

di-ō'-cī-ous-nēss, s. [English diœcious; -ness.] The quality or state of being diœcious.

di-ō'-cī-ism, s. [Mod. Lat. diœc(i)a, and Eng. suff. -ism.] The same as DIOECIOUSNESS (q. v.).

Di-ōg'-ēn-ēs, s. [Gr.] The name of a celebrated Greek philosopher, a native of Sinope. He was the disciple of Antisthenes, the founder of the Cynic school of philosophy. He was born in B. C. 413. His utter disregard of all the conveniences and comforts of life caused him great notoriety. He wore a coarse cloak, and lodged in a tub or cask. In his old age, when sailing from Athens to Egina, he was captured by pirates and carried to Crete, where he was sold as a slave to a wealthy Corinthian, named Xenitades, who made him tutor of his children, and eventually gave him his freedom. He died at Corinth, B. C. 323.

Diogenes' crab, s.

Zool.: A species of Cænobita so called from its habit of making its residence in a shell, as Diogenes did in his tub. It is a native of the West Indies, and somewhat resembles the Hermit-crab.

Diogenes' cup, s.

Anat.: The cup-like cavity of the hand, formed by bending the metacarpal bone of the little finger. It derives its name from the story that Diogenes, seeing a boy drinking water from the palm of his hand, threw away his cup as a useless luxury, and used his hand for drinking ever after.

di-ōl'-cō, in compos. [Gr. di=dis=twice, and oikos=a house.] Diœcious.

diœco-polygamous, a.

Bot.: A term used when some of the flowers of a diœcious plant produce hermaphrodite flowers.

*di-ōl'-cōūs, *di-ōl'-cīc, a. [DIOECIOUS.]

di-ō-mē-dē-ā, s. [After Diomedes, one of the Greek warriors before Troy.]

Ornith.: A genus of birds belonging to the Procellariidæ, or Petrels. Diomedea exulans is the albatross (q. v.).

di-ō-n, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, and don=an egg. So named because each scale bears two ovules.]

Bot.: A genus of Cycadaceæ. The leaves are pinnate; the leaflets very sharp; female cone large, with lance-shaped woody scales, each scale with two large seeds. A kind of arrowroot is made in Mexico from the starch which exists copiously in the seeds of Dion edule.

di-ō-næ'-ā, s. [Gr. Dionē, one of the names of Venus.]

Bot.: A genus of plants belonging to the natural order Droseraceæ. It consists of a single species, Dionaea muscipula, commonly called Venus' Fly-trap. The lamina is articulated to the petiole, and consists of two portions united together by a joint along the midrib. On the upper side of each part of the lamina are situated three irritable hairs, with swellings at the base, which, on being touched, cause the folding of the divisions from below upward, so as to inclose any object, as a fly, which may happen to light on them. The food thus captured is digested by the action of a fluid resembling gastric juice in its properties.

Venus' Fly-trap is a native of this country. The corymbs are terminal, the flowers large and white.

Dionæa.

di-ō-nŷs'-ī-ā, di-ō-nŷs'-ī-ā, s. [DIONYSIAC, (3).]

di-ō-nŷs'-ī-āc, di-ō-nŷs'-ī-āk, a. [Gr. Dionysiakos=pertaining to Dionysos or to the Dionysia, Bacchic.]

Class. Myth.: Belonging or relating to Dionysos. "Another vase represents Hephaistos returning to heaven on the Dionysiak ass."—R. Brown: Great Dionysiak Myth, i. 342.

¶ (1) Dionysiac cycle: (See extract.)

"The Dionysiac cycle forms the third of Millengen's well-known seven divisions of the Vases, according to their subjects; and includes the History of Dionysos, the Satyroi, Seilenoi, Bakchai, Mainades, the Bakchik, Thiasos, the ass Eraton, Dionysiak Festivals, processions, dances, mystic scenes, and general amusements."—R. Brown: Great Dionysiak Myth, i. 329.

(2) Dionysiac dance: A religious dance in honor of Dionysos, in which the performers pantomimically represented the principal actions of that deity.

(3) Dionysiac festivals:

(a) The Dionysia kat' agrou, or Lesser Dionysia, were celebrated in the various demes of Attica, in the month of Posidon, corresponding nearly to our December. This rural festival was doubtless the most ancient of the feasts in honor of Dionysos, and was celebrated with the greatest merriment and freedom; while it lasted slaves enjoyed their liberty, and took part in the rejoicings. It was especially a vintage festival, accompanied by song, dance, phallus-processions, and the impromptu performances of itinerant players, in which may be discovered the origin of comedy. R. Brown (op. cit.), who considers Dionysos a Semitic deity, remarks upon the vintage shoutings of Semitic nations, and in that connection cites Isaiah xvi. 9: "I will bewail with the weeping of Jazer the vine of Sibmah; I will water thee with my tears, O Heshbon and Elealeh: for the shouting for thy summer fruits and for thy harvest is fallen."

(b) The Lenæa, so called from tēnos=a winepress, were held in the month Gamelion, corresponding nearly to our January. The place of its celebration was the ancient temple of Dionysos, near which stood the Dionysiac theater. At the Lenæa there were processions and scenic contests in tragedy and comedy; a goat was sacrificed, and the chorus, standing round the altar, sang the dithyrambic ode to the god.

(c) The Anthesieria, or Feast of Flowers, took place in the month Anthesterion, corresponding nearly to February, and lasted three days. On the first day the casks of wine made in the preceding year were opened and tasted; the second day seems to have been devoted to boisterous jollity and to rude dramatic representations like those of the Lesser Dionysia; on the last day pots with flowers, fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mātē, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Syrian. æ, œ=ē; ey=ā. qu=kw.

seeds, and cooked vegetables were offered to Dionysos and to Hermes Chthonius, and games in honor of the god were celebrated.

(d) The fourth Attic festival—Dionysia en astei, the Festival in the City, or Greater Dionysia—was celebrated in the month Elaphebolion, corresponding nearly to our March, but it is uncertain whether it lasted more than one day. It was an expression of joy at the departure of winter and the promise of returning summer. According to Demosthenes the following was the order in which the solemnities took place: the great public procession, the chorus of boys, the chorus proper, and performance of comedies and tragedies. The prize awarded to the dramatist for the best play consisted of a crown, and his name was proclaimed in the Dionysiac theater.

Di-ō-nŷ'-sōs, Di-ō-nŷ'-sūs, s. [Gr. Dionysos.] Greek Myth.: The Greek god of wine, too often confused with the Latin Bacchus (q. v.).

¶ Fruit of Dionysos: (For definition see extract.)

"Dionysos is the productive, overflowing, and intoxicating power of Nature, which carries man away from his usual quiet and sober mode of living. Wine is the most natural and appropriate symbol of that power, and is therefore called the fruit of Dionysos."—Smith: Dict. of Greek and Roman Myth.

di-ō-phān'-tine, a. [After Diophantus, and Eng. adj. suff. -ine.] Of or pertaining to Diophantus, a mathematician of Alexandria, who wrote on algebra and arithmetic about the third century, A. D., according to some, but the more probable account is that he was contemporary with the Emperor Julian the Apostate, 354-363 A. D. It is to his treatise that we are, to the present day, indebted for most of our knowledge on the solution of indeterminate problems.

diophantine analysis, s.

Math.: A branch of algebra which treats of the method of solving certain kinds of indeterminate problems, relating principally to square and cube numbers, and rational right-angled triangles. The following are examples:

1. To separate a given square number into two parts, each of which shall be a square number.
2. To find three square numbers which are in arithmetical progression.
3. To find a right-angled triangle whose sides shall be commensurable with each other.

di-ōp'-side, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and opsis=appearance.]

Min.: A variety of Pyroxene, containing no alumina. It is of a white, yellowish, or pale green color, occurring in crystals, cleavable, and granular, massive. At times found colorless and transparent. Specific gravity, 3.2-3.35. Composition: Silica, 55.7; magnesia, 18.5; lime, 25.8=100. It is also called Malacolite (q. v.). A similar crystallized body has been produced by fusing silica, lime, and magnesia in the proper proportions.

di-ōp'-sis, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and opsis=appearance.]

1. Entom.: A genus of Dipterous insects, belonging to the family Muscidae, in which the eyes and antennae are situated at the extremities of long, slender, horny peduncles, rising from the sides of the head.

2. Zool.: A genus of turbellarian worms.

di-ōp'-tāse, s. [Gr. di=dis=through, and optomai=to see, because the cleavage directions are distinguishable on looking through the crystal.]

Mineral:

1. A species of beryl.
2. A rhombohedral mineral, of an emerald-green color, with a vitreous luster and green streak. It is brittle and transparent, or sub-translucent. Specific gravity, 3.27-3.34. Hardness=5. Composition: Silica, 36.47-38.93; oxide of copper, 45.10-50.10; water, 11.40-12.29. It is found in Tartary and Nassau, and is also called Emerald-copper or rhombohedral emerald-malachite.

di-ōp'-tēr, *di-ōp'-trā, s. [Gr. dioptrēr, dioptra, from dia=through, and optomai=to see.] An ancient altitude, angle, and leveling instrument; said to have been invented by Hipparchus.

di-ōp'-tric, di-ōp'-tric-al, a. [Gr. dioptrikos=pertaining to the dioptrēr or dioptra (q. v.).]

1. Affording a medium for or assisting the sight in the view of distant objects.

"View the asperities of the moon through a dioptric glass, and venture at the proportion of her hills by their shadows."—More: Antidote against Atheism.

2. Of or pertaining to dioptries.

dioptric light, s. A plan of lighting used in lighthouses in which the illumination is produced by refraction instead of reflection, as in Catoptrics (q. v.), the rays from a central lamp being transmitted through a combination of lenses surrounding it. Lenses were used in England in the South Foreland light in 1752, and in the Portland light in 1789. The system fell into disfavor, owing to certain mechanical difficulties in the construction and arrangement of the lenses. It was revived and improved by Fresnel about 1810, and has been generally adopted throughout France and Holland, and partially in England. It is considered superior to the catoptric, and was re-adopted in England in 1834, being placed in the Lundy Island Lighthouse, Devonshire. (Knight.)

dioptric micrometer, s. A form of the double image micrometer, introduced by Ramsden (1738-1800), in which the divided lens is in the eye-tube. In the ordinary form it is the object-glass which is divided.

dioptric system, s. The system of lighting by refraction instead of reflection. [DIOPTRIC LIGHT.]

dioptric telescope, s.

Optical Instrum.: The same as a refracting telescope. It is opposed to a catoptric or reflecting telescope.

di-ōp'-trics, *di-ōp'-tricks, s. [DIOPTRIC.]

Optics: That branch of the science which treats of the different refractions of light in passing through different mediums, as air, water, glass, &c., but especially through lenses. [REFRACTION.]

di-ō-ra'-mā, s. [Greek di=dis=through, and horama=a view; horaō=to see.]

1. A mode of scenic representation in which the spectator and picture are placed in separate rooms, and the picture viewed through an aperture the sides of which are continued toward the picture, so as to prevent the distraction of the eye by other objects. All light admitted passes through this aperture from the picture, which is illuminated by light from above at such an angle as to be reflected through the aperture toward the spectators. By means of shutters, screens and reflectors, the light is modified to represent changes of sunlight, cloud, and moonlight; transparent portions of the picture admitting light from behind certain portions which are brilliantly illuminated. (Knight.)

¶ Dioramas were first exhibited in London, September 29, 1823, by the inventors, MM. Daguerre and Bouton.

2. A building in which dioramic views are exhibited.

di-ō-rām'-ic, a. [Eng. dioram(a); -ic.] Relating or pertaining to a diorama.

di-ō-rism, s. [Gr. diorismos=a defining, a definition; diorizō=to bound, to define. The act of defining; a definition, a distinction.

"To eat things sacrificed to idols, is one mode of idolatry: but, by a prophetic diorism, it signifies idolatry in general."—More: Expos. of Sev. Churches, p. 72.

di-ō-ris'-tic, *di-ō-ris'-tic-al, a. [Gr. dioristikos, from diorizō=to bound, to define.] Defining, distinguishing.

di-ō-ris'-tic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. dioristical; -ly.] By way of definition or distinction.

"Which vice is here noted by Nicolaitism dioristically."—More: Expos. of Sev. Churches, p. 72.

di-ō-rite, di-ō-ryte, s. [Gr. dioros=a divider; diorizō=to divide, to bound.]

Geol.: A granite-like rock, consisting of hornblende and albite. It is grayish-white to nearly black in color. It derives its name from being unmistakable or clearly defined, as distinguished from Dolerite (q. v.).

di-ō-rīt'-ic, a. [Eng. dioritic(e); -ic.] Pertaining to, containing, or of the nature of diorite.

di-ōr-thō-, in compos. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and Eng., &c., ortho- (q. v.).]

Chem.: A term applied to aromatic compounds containing two benzene rings, in each of which the atoms of hydrogen in the position (1-2) are respectively replaced by other monad elements, or monad radicals.

di-ōr-thō'-sis, s. [Gr., from diorthōō=to make straight: dia=through, and orthōō=to make straight; orthos=straight.]

1. Surg.: The reduction of a fracture or dislocated bone.

2. Rhet.: (See extract.)

"The diorthosis—i. e., the setting free from figure and parable, the fulfilment of the Old Testament in the New."—British Quarterly Review (1873), vol. lvii., p. 297.

di-ōr-thōt'-ic, a. [Gr. diorthotikos, from diorthōō.] Pertaining to the correction or emendation of ancient texts.

"He took leave forever of diorthotic criticism."—London Quarterly Review, in Ogilvie.

di-ōs-cō-rē-ā, s. [Named after Dioscorides, a Greek physician.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, the typical one of the order Dioscoreaceae. Various species, as Dioscorea alata, sativa, Batatas, and aculeata, produce the esculent tubers called Yams, which are used in warm countries as a substitute for potatoes.

di-ōs-cō-rē-ā-çē-ā, s. pl. [Mod. Latin dioscore(a), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceae.]

Bot.: A natural order of plants belonging to the class Dictyogens, consisting of twining shrubs, with large epigeal or hypogeal tubers; leaves alternate, sometimes opposite, and reticulated; flowers small, spiked, bracteate, and unisexual; perianth in six divisions, adherent; seeds compressed, winged or wingless. Lindley enumerates six genera and 110 species. Testudinaria Elephantipes is the Tortoise plant of the Cape, or Elephant's-foot. Tamus communis, Black Bryony, is common in hedge-rows. [BRYONY.]

di-ōs-mā, s. [Gr. di=dis=through, and osmē=a smell.]

1. Bot.: A genus of plants, belonging to the Rutaceae or Rue family. They are small shrubs with white or red flowers; leaves alternate or opposite, simple. They are remarkable for their overpowering and penetrating odor, arising from the presence of a yellowish volatile oil. They are the Bucku plants of the Cape of Good Hope.

2. Pharm.: It has been employed in chronic affections of the bladder and urinary organs in general, and has also been administered in cholera.

di-ōs-mē-ā, s. pl. [Mod. Latin diosm(a), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eae.]

Bot.: A sub-order of plants, with exalbuminous seeds, and a two-valved endocarp, which dehisces at the base, and when the seed is ripe separates from a two-valved sarcocarp. They abound at the Cape of Good Hope and New Holland.

di-ōs-mine, s. [Mod. Lat. diosm(a), and Eng. suff. -ine (Chem.) (q. v.).]

Chem.: A chemical substance obtained from the leaves of Diosma crinata.

di-ōs-mōse, s. [Greek diosmos=transmitting smells.]

Botan. Physiol.: The mingling of fluids through a permeable partition wall without visible perforations. It is called also Osmose and Diffusion.

di-ōs-pŷr-ōs, s. [Gr. dios=divine, and pyros=wheat.]

Bot.: A genus of plants belonging to the natural order Ebenaceae. They consist of trees and shrubs, with white or pale yellow flowers. Diospyros lotos is the Indian Dateplum, and is supposed by some to be the Lotus of the ancients. [LOTUS.] The trees of several of the species furnish ebony wood. The fruit of D. kaki is occasionally brought from China as a dry sweetmeat, and D. virginiana is the date-plum, the bark of which is used in cases of cholera infantum and diarrhoea. A kind of cider has been made from this fruit, and a spirituous liquor distilled from its fermented infusion.

di-ō-tā, s. [Lat., from Gr. diōtos=two-eared: di=dis=twice, twofold, and ous (genit. ōtos)=an ear.]

Antiq.: A vessel used for water or wine. It had a narrow neck, a full body, and two handles, whence the name. The form and size varied, but it was generally made tall and narrow, and terminating in a point, which could be let into a stand or into the ground, to keep the vessel upright, in which position several have been found in the cellars at Pompeii.

di-ō-tis, s. [Gr. diōtos=two-eared, so named from the lobes of the corolla being ear-shaped.] [DIOTA.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, belonging to the natural order Chenopodiaceae, so called from the two ear-like appendages at the base of the florets. Diots maritima (Sea-side Cotton-weed) is found on sea shores, the root running deeply into the sand; the leaves, which are oblong, are covered with a dense tomentum of a white color; the flowers are yellow.

di-ōx'-ide, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. oxide (q. v.).]

Chem.: A term applied to an oxide consisting of one atom of a metal combined with two of oxygen.

di-ōx'-in-dōl, s. [Eng. diox(ide); ind(igo), and (alcohol).]

Chem.: $C_8H_7NO_2$. Ortho-amido-phenyl-glycollic anhydride, C_6H_4 —NH—CO. Dioxindol is obtained by boiling isatin with water containing a little hydrochloric acid and zinc dust. It is soluble in water and in alcohol, crystallizes in colorless prisms, which turn yellow. It melts at 180°, and decomposes at 195°, forming aniline. Its aqueous solution oxidizes and turns red, isatin being formed. By the action of nitrous acid on its alcoholic solution, it is converted into nitroso-dioxindol, $C_8H_6(NO)NO_2$, which melts at 300°, and sublimes in white needles.

bōll, bōŷ; pōāt, jōwł; cat, çell, chorus, çhīn, bench; go, gem; thin, thīs; sīn, aŷ; expect, Xēnophon, exīst. ph=f.
-cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -ston = shūn; -tīon, -gīon = zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious = shīs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

di-ōx-ŷ, di-ōx-, in compos. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. &c., oxy- (q. v.).]

Chem.: Organic compounds containing the monad radical hydroxyl twice, each of which has replaced an atom of hydrogen, as dioxy-benzene, $C_6H_4(OH)_2$.

dioxy-benzaldehyde, s.

Chem.: $C_6H_3(OH)_2CO\cdot H$. Exists in several modifications. [RESORCYLALDEHYDE, PROTOCATECHUIC ALDEHYDE.]

dioxy-benzene, s.

Chem.: $C_6H_4(OH)_2$. Exists in three modifications: Ortho-, 1-2 [PYROCATECHIN]; para-, 1-3 [RESORCIN]; meta-, 1-4 [HYDROQUINONE].

dioxy-benzoic, a.

Chem.: Dioxy-benzoic acids, $C_6H_3(OH)_2CO\cdot OH$. [OXYALICYLIC ACID, PROTOCATECHUIC ACID.]

di-ōx-ŷ-lŷte, s. [Ger. dioxyllith; Gr. dia=through . . . in different directions; oxus=sharp . . . dazzling, bright, and lithos=stone(?).] Min.: The same as LANARKITE (q. v.).

dip, *dippe, *duppe, *dyp-pyn, v. t. & i. [A. S. dippan; cogn. with Dan. dyppe; Sw. doppa=to dip; Dan. doopen; Goth. daupjan; Ger. taufen=to baptize.] [DEEP, DIVE.]

A. Transitive:

1. Literally:

1. To immerse or plunge in a liquid for a short time.

"Send Lazarus that he dippe the last part of his finger in water, and kele my tunge."—Wycliffe: Luke xvi. 24.

2. To wet, to moisten; to make damp or wet.

"And though not mortal, yet a cold shudd'ring dew
Dips me all o'er, as when the wrath of Jove Speaks thunder and the chains of Erebus
To some of Saturn's crew."

Milton: Comus, 802-06.

3. To bail or take out as with a ladle. (Generally with the adverb out.)

*4. To baptize by immersion.

II. Figuratively:

1. To bend down, to bow, to stoop.

2. To engage in any affair.

"In Richard's time, I doubt, he was a little dippt in the rebellion of the Commons."—Dryden: Fables (Pref.).

3. To engage as a pledge; to mortgage.

"Put out the principal in trusty hands, Live on the use, and never dip thy lands," Dryden: Persius, sat. vi.

B. Intransitive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) To plunge into a liquid for a short time.

"Unwatched along Clitumnus Grazes the milk-white steer;
Unharm'd the water-fowl may dip
In the Volturnian mere."
Macaulay: Horatius Cocles, vii.

(2) To take a small piece of food.

"And he answered and said unto them, It is one of the twelve, that dippeth with me in the dish."—Mark xiv. 20.

2. Figuratively:

(1) To sink, as below the horizon; to set.

"The sun's rim dips, the stars rush out,
At one stride comes the dark."
Coleridge: Ancient Mariner, lii.

(2) To stoop, to bend, to bow.

(3) To enter, to pierce slightly.

"The vulture dipping in Prometheus' side,
His bloody beak with his torn liver dyed."
Granville.

(4) To engage or enter slightly into any business.

(5) To read or glance through cursorily; to peruse here and there at random.

"When I think all the repetitions are struck out in a copy, I sometimes find more upon dipping in the first volume."—Pope.

(6) To choose by chance.

"With what ill thoughts of Jove art thou possessed?
Wouldst thou prefer him to some man? Suppose I dipped among the worst, and Staius chose?"
Dryden: Persius, sat. ii.

dip, s. [DIP, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) An inclination or sloping downward.

"Great columns of stone hang down the face of some of these rocks almost perpendicularly, or with a very slight dip."—Pennant.

(2) A depression, a hollow.

"The constant turns in the road, the dips of landscape."
—London Daily Telegraph.

(3) The act of dipping or immersing in a liquid.

"The dip of oars in unison awake."
Glover: Athentad, viii.

(4) A bath, a bathing.

(5) A candle made by repeated dipping of the wick in melted tallow.

"He burns wax, while we burn dips."
Punch, Feb. 6, 1858.

*2. Fig.: The act of taking that which comes first.

II. Technically:

1. Compass: The vertical angle which a freely suspended needle makes with the horizon. Inclination. [DIPPING-NEEDLE.]

2. Mining Eng.: The inclination or pitch of a stratum. The point of the compass toward which it declines is the point of dip. The angle with the horizontal is the amount of dip or the angle of dip. The strike is the extension of the stratum at right angles to the dip. Dip is also known as Hade, Slope, and Underlie.

3. Geol.: The inclination or angle at which strata slope or dip downward into the earth. This angle is measured from the plane of the horizon or level, and may be readily ascertained by the clinometer. [CLINOMETER.] The opposite of dip is rise, and either expression may be used, according to the position of the observer. It is used in geological maps to indicate the direction of the dip by an arrow, and the line of outcrop or strike of a stratum by a bold line, the one being at right angles to the other. [STRIKE, s.]

4. Naut.: The depth of submergence of the float of a paddle-wheel.

5. Vehicles: The slight downward inclination of the arms of an axle. [SWING.]

6. Fortification:

(1) The superior slope of a parapet.

(2) The inclination of the sole of an embrasure.

Dip of the horizon: The angle contained between two straight lines drawn from the eye of the observer, which is supposed to be above the level of the sea, the one to a point on the visible horizon, the other parallel to the horizon.

dip-chick, s. [DABCHICK.]

dip-circle, s. A vertical graduated circle, in the plane of which a delicate magnetic needle is suspended on a horizontal axis, which rests upon two polished agate supports. The circle is set in the plane of the magnetic meridian, and the needle indicates upon the graduated circle the angle of inclination.

dip-head level, s.

Mining: The gallery proceeding right and left from the engine-pit bottom. The main-level.

dip-pipe, s. A device, also known as a seal, in the hydraulic main of gas-works.

dip-roller, s.

Printing: A roller to dip ink from the fountain.

dip-sector, s. A reflecting-instrument. One was invented by Dr. Wollaston, and one by Troughton. It is used for ascertaining the true dip of the horizon; the principle is similar to the sextant.

di-pa-ra-, in compos. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. &c., para- (q. v.).]

Chem.: Compounds containing two benzene rings, in each of which the atoms of hydrogen in the position (1-4) are respectively replaced by other monad elements, or monad radicals.

di-pās'-chal, a. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. pascal (q. v.).] Including two passovers.

di-pēt'-a-lous, a. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. petalous (q. v.).]

Bot.: Two-petaled; having two separate petals.

di pēt'-tō, phr. [Ital.]

Music: With the natural voice; opposed to falsetto.

diph'-an-ite, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold; phainō=to appear, and Eng. suff. -ite (Min.) (q. v.).]

Min.: A variety of Margarite occurring in hexagonal prisms. Color white to bluish. It occurs in the emerald mines of the Ural, with chrysoberyl and phenacite. Specific gravity, 3.04-3.97; hardness, 5-5.5.

diph'-da, s. [Arab.] A fixed star, of magnitude 2½, called also Beta Ceti.

di-phēn'-ic, a. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. phenic (q. v.).]

diphenic acid, s.

Chem.: $C_6H_4CO\cdot OH$ (Di-ortho) is obtained by the oxidation of phenanthrene or phenanthrenequinone with chromic acid mixture. It is soluble in hot water, alcohol, and ether; and crystallizes in needles, which melt at 225° and sublime. Its barium and calcium salts are soluble in water. When heated with soda lime, it yields diphenyl.

di-phēn'-ōl. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. phenol (q. v.).]

Chem.: $C_{12}H_8(OH)_2$. $C_6H_4(OH)\cdot C_6H_4(OH)$ (Di-para). Obtained from benzidine [DIPHENYL], by converting it into a diazo compound and decomposing with boiling water. It forms colorless needles, melting at 272°. Other modifications are known.

di-phēn'-ŷl. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. phenyl (q. v.).]

Chem.: $C_{12}H_{10}$, or $C_6H_5\cdot C_6H_5$ (Phenyl-benzene).

An aromatic hydrocarbon obtained by the action of sodium on a solution of brom-benzene, C_6H_5Br , in ether; or by passing the vapor of benzene through a red-hot iron tube containing fragments of pumice, and by heating potassium phenol, $C_6H_5\cdot OK$, with potassium benzoate, $C_6H_5\cdot CO\cdot OK$. It occurs in coal-tar oil. Diphenyl crystallizes out of alcohol and ether in large colorless plates, which melt at 70.5° and boil at 254°. When dissolved in glacial acetic acid it is oxidized by chromic anhydride to benzoic acid. By the action of halogens, nitric acid, and sulphuric acid on diphenyl, there are found mono- and di-substitution compounds. By oxidation with chromic anhydride the mono-substituted diphenyls yield para-derivatives of benzoic acid, the other benzene ring being broken up. By the action of fuming nitric acid on diphenyl two modifications of dinitro-diphenyl, $C_{12}H_8NO_2$, are formed, (alpha) or di-para-is in alcohol slightly soluble, and melts at 233°; the other (beta) is more soluble in alcohol, and melts at 93°. By the reduction of the (alpha) di-para, $C_6H_4NO_2\cdot C_6H_4NO_2$, benzidine, $C_6H_4NH_2\cdot C_6H_4NH_2$, is formed. Benzidine is soluble in hot water and in alcohol; it crystallizes in silver-white flutes, which melt at 188°. It is also obtained by the action of sodium on para-bromaniline, $C_6H_4Br(NH_2)$.

diphenyl-acetic acid, s.

Inorganic chemistry: $(C_6H_5)_2CH\cdot CO\cdot OH$. It is obtained by heating a mixture of phenyl brom-acetic acid, $C_6H_5CHBr\cdot CO\cdot OH$, with benzene and zinc dust. Also by heating benzoic acid $(C_6H_5)\cdot C(OH)\cdot CO\cdot OH$, with hydriodic acid to 150°. It crystallizes from water in needles, from alcohol in plates, which melt at 146°. It is oxidized by chromic acid mixture into benzo-phenone; by heating with soda-lime into diphenyl-methane, $C_6H_5CH_2\cdot C_6H_5$.

diphenyl-benzene, s.

Chem.: $C_6H_4\cdot C_6H_5$ Diphenylphenylene. A hydrocarbon formed by the action of sodium on a mixture of dibromobenzene (1-2) and bromobenzene C_6H_5Br , and by passing the mixed vapors of diphenyl and benzene through a red-hot tube. Diphenyl-benzene crystallizes in needles, which melt at 205° and boil at 400°. Dissolved in glacial acetic acid, it is oxidized by chromic trioxide, C_2O_3 , to diphenyl-carbonic acid, $C_6H_5\cdot C_6H_4\cdot CO\cdot OH$, and then to terephthalic acid, $C_6H_4\cdot COOH\cdot COOH$ (1-4).

diphenyl-dicarboxylic acid, s.

$C_6H_4\cdot CO\cdot OH$

Chem.: $C_6H_4\cdot CO\cdot OH$ (Dipara-). It is obtained by heating dicyan-diphenyl, $C_{12}H_8(CN)_2$, with alcoholic potash, and oxidizing a solution of diethyl in glacial acetic acid with chromic anhydride. It is a white amorphous powder, insoluble in alcohol and in ether. Its barium and calcium salts are insoluble in water. Heated with lime, it yields diphenyl.

diphenyl-glycollic acid, s. [BENZILIC ACID.]

diphenyl-ketone, s. [BENZOPHENONE.]

diphenyl-methane, s. [BENZYL-BENZENE.]

di-phēn'-ŷl-a-mine, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold; Eng. phenyl, and -amine (Chem.) (q. v.).]

Chem.: An aromatic secondary monamine. Diphenylamine, $(C_6H_5)_2NH$, is obtained by the dry distillation of triphenyl-rosaniline (rosaniline blue); also by heating aniline hydrochlorate, $C_6H_5\cdot NH_2\cdot HCl$, with aniline, $NH_2\cdot (C_6H_5)$, to 240°; also by heating aniline phenol with $NaCl_2$ to 260°. Diphenylamine is a pleasant-smelling crystalline substance, which melts at 54° and boils at 310°. It is nearly insoluble in water, easily soluble in alcohol and in ether. It is a weak base; its salts are decomposed by water. It is colored a deep blue by nitric acid, and by sulphuric acid which contains oxides of nitrogen. By heating diphenylamine with benzyl-chloride, $C_6H_5CH_2Cl$, and soda solution, benzyl-diphenylamine, $(C_6H_5)_2N\cdot CH_2\cdot C_6H_5$, is obtained, which melts at 87°; and by oxidation with arsenic acid it yields a green dye, viridin.

di-phēn'-ŷl-ēne, a. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold; Eng. phenyl, and suff. -ene (Chem.) (q. v.).] diphenylene-methane, s.

C_6H_4
Chem.: Fluorene, $C_{16}H_{10}$ > CH_2 . An aromatic hydrocarbon, occurring in the part of coal-tar which boils between 300° and 305°. It is also obtained by passing the vapor of diphenyl-methane, fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, there; pine, pīt, sire, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cār, rāle, fūll; trŷ, sŷrian. ə, ə = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

$C_6H_5 \cdot CH_2 \cdot C_6H_5$, through a red-hot tube, and by heating diphenylene-ketone with zinc-dust to 160° . It crystallizes out of hot alcohol in colorless plates, which have a violet fluorescence, melting at 113° and boiling at 295° . By oxidation with chromic acid mixture it yields diphenylene ketone (q. v.).

diphenylene-ketone, s.

Chem.: $C_{13}H_{10}O$, or $\begin{matrix} C_6H_5 \\ | \\ C_6H_4 \\ | \\ CO \end{matrix}$. Obtained by heating diphenic acid, or phenyl-benzoic acid with lime, or by oxidation of diphenylene-methane with chromic acid mixture; also by heating anthraquinone and phenanthrene-quinone with caustic potash. Diphenylene-ketone is soluble in alcohol and ether; it crystallizes in large yellow prisms, which melt at 84° and boil at 337° . By permanganate of potassium it is oxidized into phthalic acid, $C_6H_4 < \begin{smallmatrix} COOH \\ COOH \end{smallmatrix} (1-2)$. Fused with potash it forms phenyl-benzoic acid, $C_6H_5 \cdot C_6H_4 \cdot CO \cdot OH$. By reducing agents it is converted into diphenylene-methane.

diphenylene-oxide, s.

Chem.: $C_{12}H_8O$, or $\begin{matrix} C_6H_4 \\ | \\ C_6H_4 \\ | \\ O \end{matrix}$. Obtained by heating phenol with lead oxide. It crystallizes in plates, which melt at 81° and boil at 273° .

di-phên-yl-im-ide, s. [Greek di=dis=twice, twofold; Eng. phenyl, and suff. -imide (Chem.) (q. v.).]

Chem.: Carbazol, $C_{12}H_9N$, or $\begin{matrix} C_6H_5 \\ | \\ C_6H_4 \\ | \\ NH \end{matrix}$. Obtained by passing the vapor of aniline, $C_6H_5 \cdot NH_2$, or diphenyl-amine, $(C_6H_5)_2NH$, through a red-hot tube. It is found in coal-tar, which boils between 320° and 360° . It crystallizes out of red-hot alcohol in colorless plates, which melt at 238° and boil at 351° . It dissolves in concentrated sulphuric acid, forming a yellow solution, which is turned dark green by oxidizing agents. The atom of nitrogen occupies the ortho position in both benzene rings.

di-phên-yl-ol, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold; Eng. phenyl, and (alcohol).]

Organic Chemistry: Oxydiphenyl, $C_{12}H_9OH$, or $C_6H_5 \cdot C_6H_4(OH)$. Obtained by the action of potassium nitrite, KNO_2 , on amido-diphenyl sulphate. It sublimes in colorless plates, which melt at 165° . It dissolves in concentrated sulphuric acid, forming a beautiful green solution.

di-phê-lăt-ic, a. [Gr. *diphros=*a chariot, and *elatikos=*pertaining to driving: *elawnô=*to drive.] Chariot-driving.

"I and others known to me studied the diphrelatic art."—De Quincey: English Mail Coach. (Davies.)

diph-thêr'-i-a, s. [From Greek *diphthera=*leather, a membrane.]

Med.: A specific constitutional blood disease, characterized by the forming of a false membrane composed of elastic fibers, of a higher organization than the false membrane of Croup (q. v.), and found chiefly on the pharynx, nostrils, tonsils, and palate, or on any denuded surface of skin, as tongue, gums, and sometimes even the œsophagus, rarely on the larynx, the chief seat of the pellicle in croup, and still more rarely in the trachea and bronchi; the membrane is of an ashy-gray color, and penetrates through the epithelium, constantly leaving a bleeding surface when detached. Diphtheria is often followed by paralysis, chiefly of the palate; is frequently epidemic, though sometimes sporadic, highly contagious, and terminating often by blood poisoning. A glandular swelling in the neck behind the angle of the jaw is usual in diphtheria, and the disease is accompanied by dangerous interruption of the renal functions, from the presence of albumen in the urine. The peculiar hereditariness of croup also distinguishes it from this disease, as no one has ever heard of diphtheria being transmitted in that way; it is only spread by contagion. Diphtheria is a disease of all ages; croup of infancy and childhood. Inflammatory changes of the parotid and sub-maxillary glands are common in diphtheria, with much difficulty in swallowing. From its asthenic character it is a highly dangerous disease, some physicians putting the mortality as high as 90 per cent. The local symptoms of diphtheria, although to a great degree dangerous from the mechanical obstruction of the air passages, are only the manifestation of the constitutional sepsis and not the disease, per se. The treatment must be both local and constitutional. Iron, quinine, or cinchona bark, chlorate of potash, are the chief remedies, with local application of the saturated solution of the perchloride of iron with glycerine; chlorine, carbolic acid, &c., are also useful. Diphtheria frequently accompanies croup, scarlet fever, typhoid fever, &c., and then the chances of recovery are very doubtful.

diph-thêr'-i-al, diph-thêr'-ic, a. [Eng. diphtheria; -al, -ic.] Pertaining to diphtheria; diphtheritic.

diph-thêr'-it-ic, a. [Eng. diphtheria; -itic.] Pertaining to, arising from, or of the nature of diphtheria.

A. As substantive

Gram.: The union or coalition of two vowel sounds in one syllable.

"Pronouncing the vowels and diphthongs, and several of the consonants very much amiss."—Strype: Life of Sir J. Cheke, ch. i., § 2.

B. As adj.: Of the nature of a diphthong; diphthongal.

"We abound more in vowel and diphthong sounds."—Blair, vol. i., lect. 9.

diph-thôn'-gal, dip-thôn'-gal, a. [Eng. diphthong; -al.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a diphthong; consisting of two vowel sounds in one syllable.

"In the same manner the English alphabetical sound of the a, as in gate, is replaced by another diphthongal one."—Prince L. Bonaparte, in Trans. Philological Society (1876), p. 575.

diph-thôn'-gal-ly, dip-thôn'-gal-ly, adverb. [Eng. diphthongal; -ly.] In a diphthongal manner; as a diphthong.

diph-thôn'-gă-tion, dip-thôn'-gă-tion, s. [Eng. diphthong; -ation.] The formation or conversion of a simple vowel into a diphthong by affixing another vowel.

diph-thông'-ic, a. [Eng. diphthong; -ic.] Of the nature of a diphthong; diphthongal.

"The diphthongic character of our ê and ô."—H. Sweet, in Trans. Philological Society (1873-4), p. 580.

diph-thôn'-giz-ă-tion, s. [Eng. diphthongize (e); -ation.] The same as DIPHTHONGATION (q. v.).

"The broad element and the labial being pronounced successively instead of simultaneously—a common source of diphthongization."—H. Sweet, in Trans. Philological Society (1876), p. 568.

diph-thôn'-gize, v. t. & i. [Eng. diphthong; -ize.]

A. Trans.: To form or convert a simple vowel into a diphthong by affixing another vowel.

"Long i and u . . . soon began to be diphthongized."—H. Sweet, in Trans. Philological Society (1873-4), p. 520.

B. Intrans.: To be converted into a diphthong.

"It is clear that rod could not diphthongize into ea."—H. Sweet, in Trans. Philological Society (1876), p. 568.

dî-phu-cêph-a-ă-a, s. [Gr. *diphys=*of double nature or form, and *kephalê=*a head.]

Entom.: A genus of Coleopterous insects, belonging to the family Lamellicornes. They are generally of a rich golden-green color.

dî-phý-cêrc, dî-phý-cêr'-cal, a. [Gr. *diphys=*of double nature or form, and *kerkos=*a tail.] A term applied to those fishes in which the vertebral column extends into the upper lobe of the tail.

"The tail is divided into two equal lobes by the prolonged conical termination of the body, thus becoming diphycercal."—Nicholson: Man. of Paleont., p. 321.

dî-phý-dêg, dî-phý-dæ, dî-phý-êg, s. pl. [Gr. *diphys=*of double nature or form.]

Zool.: A genus of free-swimming Hydrozoa, belonging to the order Siphonophora, sub-order Calyphoræ (q. v.), and typical of the family Diphydæ (or Diphydæ). The genus Diphys has two swimming-sacs, one placed as it were within the bell of the other.

dî-phýl'-loûs, a. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and *phyllos=*a leaf.]

Bot.: Having two leaves, as a calyx, &c.

dî-phý-ô-dônt, a. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold; *phýo=*to generate, and odous (genit. odontos)=a tooth.]

Zool.: A term applied to those mammals which have two sets of teeth: one deciduous, the other permanent. Most animals are diphyodont. Those which have only one set are termed monophyodont.

dî-phý-ô-zô-ôid, s. [Greek *diphys=*of double nature or form, *zôon=*an animal, and *eidos=*appearance.]

Zool.: One of the detached reproductive portions of adult members of that order of oceanic Hydrozoa called Calycophoridæ. They swim about by means of their cilia.

dî-phýs-çl-ă-cê-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. diphysci (um), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -acæ.]

Bot.: A family of operculate Acrocarpus mosses, having a capsule of very curious structure, being large, oblique, and gibbous. Inflorescence monocious.

dî-phýs-çl-âm, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and *physkon=*a kind of bean.]

Bot.: A genus of Acrocarpus mosses, the type of the family Diphysciæ. Calyptra conical, peristome simple, internal, surrounded at the base by a large, multiplex, soluble annulus. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

dip-in, s. [Gael. *dipinn=*a net.]

1. A part of a herring-net.

"Sex herring-nets with six dipins."—Depred. Argyll (1686).

2. The bag of a salmon-net.

dip-la-căn-thùs, s. [Gr. *diploos=*double, and *akantha=*a spine.]

Palæont.: A genus of Ganoid fishes, belonging to the sub-order Acanthodidæ, and found only in the Devonian rocks. It is distinguished by two dorsal fins, the fronts of which are provided with a strong spine, simply implanted in the flesh; tail heterocercal, scales exceedingly small, shagreen like; no operculum.

dî-plăx, s. [Gr.=double-folded.]

Zool.: A genus of Rotatoria belonging to the family Eucalanidota, and forming a connecting link between Salpina and Dinocharis. Carapace cleft down the back, and destitute of spines back and front; foot and toes long and slender.

dî-plăz'-y-âm, s. [From Gr. *diplozô=*to double. So named because the indusium is double.]

Bot.: A genus of Polypodiaceæ. The rhizomes of Diplazium esculentum are occasionally eaten.

dî-plê-cô-lô-bê-æ, s. pl. [Gr. di=twice; *plekô=*to plait, to twine, to weave; *lobos=*a lobe, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ.]

Bot.: A sub-division of the order Cruciferae, in which the cotyledons are twice folded. A section across the seed presents an appearance like this— ∞ || ||.

dî-plêi'-dô-scôpe, s. [Gr. *diploos=*double; *eidos=*appearance, and *skopeô=*to see, to view.]

Optics: An optical instrument for indicating the passage of a heavenly body over the meridian by the coincidence of two images formed by a single and double refraction from a triangular prism which has one transparent and two silvered planes, one of the latter being in the plane of the meridian. (Brande.)

dî-plin'-thl-ûs, s. [Gr. di=twice, twofold, and *plinthos=*a brick.] A wall of two bricks thick.

dîp-lô-dăc-tyl-ûs, s. [Gr. *diploos=*double, and *daktylos=*a finger, a toe.]

Zool.: A genus of lizards belonging to the family Gecktoideæ.

dîp-lô-dôn'-tûs, s. [Gr. *diploos=*double, and odous (genit. odontos)=a tooth.]

Zool.: A genus of Arachnida of the order Acarina and family Hydrachnea, having the mandibles terminated by a straight, acute, and immovable tooth, to which is attached a movable hook or claw.

dîp-lô-ê, s. [Gr. *diploos=*double, twofold.]

1. Anat.: A soft medullary substance or osseous tissue between the plates of the skull.

2. Bot.: That part of the parenchyma of a leaf which intervenes between the two layers of epiderm.

dîp-lô-gên'-ic, a. [Greek *diploos=*double, and *gennaô=*to generate, to produce.] Partaking of the nature of two bodies; producing two substances.

dîp-lô-grăp'-sûs, s. [Gr. *diploos=*double, and Mod. Lat. grapsus, a modification of graptolite (q. v.).]

Palæont.: A genus of fossil Hydrozoa in which the polypary consists of two simple monopronidian stipes, firmly united to one another, back to back. They range in this country and Britain from the Upper Cambrian to the summit of the Lower Silurian series; but in Bohemia they rise into the lower portion of the Upper Silurian deposits. They belong to the sub-class Graptoliteæ.

dîp-lô-ic, dîp-lô-êt-ic, a. [Mod. Lat. diploe, and Eng. adj. suff. -ic, -etic.]

Anat.: Of or pertaining to the diploe.

diploic-veins, diploetic-veins.

Anat.: Veins in the flat cranial bones, the trunks and larger branches of which run mostly separately in special arborescent larger canals. (Dunghison.)

dîp-lô-ite, s. [Ger. diploite, from Gr. *diploos=*twofold, double, and suff. -ite (Min.) (q. v.).] So named because the crystals are often in twins. Min.: The same as LATROBITE (q. v.).

bôil, bôy; pôt, jôwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhîn, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şhûn; -tîon, -şion = zhûn. -tions, -cions, -sions = şhûs. -ble, -die, &c. = bel, del.

dī-plō-mā, s. [Lat., from Gr. diplōma=(1) anything folded, (2) a license, a diploma, from diplōos=double; Fr. diplôme.]

I. Ordinary Language:

- *1. A paper or document, written and folded.
2. In the same sense as II. 2.

II Technically:

1. Chem.: A double vessel; a water-bath.
2. Law.: A writing or document conferring some power, authority, privilege, or honor, usually under seal and signed by a duly authorized official. Diplomas are given to graduates of a university on their taking their degrees; to clergymen who are licensed to officiate; to physicians, civil engineers, &c., authorizing them to practice their professions.

"To persuade the University of Dublin to send a diploma to me, constituting this poor man Master of Arts in their University."—Lord Gower in Murphy's Life of Johnson.

dī-plō-maed, a. [Eng. diploma; -ed.] Fortified, strengthened, or supported by a diploma.

"Doggeries never so diplomaed, bepudded, gaslighted, continue doggeries."—Carlyle.

dī-plōm'-a-čy, s. [Fr. diplomatie.]

1. The science or art of conducting negotiations between nations; the art of managing public business and protecting public interests in matters in which foreign nations are concerned; political skill and tact.

"A family eminently distinguished at the bar, on the bench, in the senate, in diplomacy, in arms, and in letters."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

2. The act of negotiating between nations; the forms of international negotiations

"The insurrection began some months since, and diplomacy was at once in action."—London Times.

*3. The body of ministers accredited to a foreign court collectively; the diplomatic corps.

"The foreign ministers were ordered to attend . . . The diplomacy, who were a sort of envoys, were quite awestruck."—Burke: Regicide Peace, lett. 4.

4. Tact or skill in conducting negotiations of any kind; artful or dexterous management.

dīp-lō-māt, dīp-lō-māte, a. & s. [Fr. diplomate.]

A. As adj.: Invested or presented with a diploma.

B. As subst.: A diplomatist.

"Sir Charles, who wears the Windsor uniform, is assiduous in his attentions to the diplomats."—London Daily Telegraph.

dī-plō-māte, v. t. [Eng. diplomate(a); -ate.] To invest or present with a diploma.

"By virtue of the Chancellor's letters he was diplomated doctor of divinity in 1660."—Wood: Athenæ Oxon. (Bp. Nicholson.)

dī-plō-māt-ēd, pa. par. or a. [DIPLOMATE, v.] dīp-lō-mā-ti-āl (tī as čl), a. [Lat. diploma (genit. diplomatis), and Eng. adj. suff. -ial.] Diplomatic.

dīp-lō-māt-ic, dīp-lō-māt-ick, a. & s. [Fr. diplomatique.]

A. As adjective:

- *1 Pertaining or relating to diplomas
2. Pertaining or relating to the science of diplomacies.

"One of the principal objects of the following work is the illustration of what for near two centuries has been called the diplomatic science."—Astle: Origin and Progress of Writing (Introd.).

3. Pertaining or relating to diplomacy or to ambassadors.

"He would have been condemned, even by the low standard of diplomatic morality in the last century."—London Times.

4. Engaged or skilled in diplomacy; accredited to a foreign court.

"His lordship is a great member of the diplomatic body."—Burke: On a Regicide Peace.

5. Artful, skillful, dexterous; full of or characterized by tact.

B. As substantive:

1. A diplomatist; one engaged or skilled in diplomacy.

2. Diplomacy.

"Boasting his ignorance in the diplomatic."—Burke: Address of the Brissotins (App.).

3. Pl. [DIPLOMATICS.]

dīp-lō-māt-ic-āl, a. [Eng. diplomatic; -al.] The same as DIPLOMATIC (q. v.).

dīp-lō-māt-ic-āl-lŷ, adv. [Eng. diplomatically.] In a diplomatic, artful, or dexterous manner; by diplomacy.

dīp-lō-māt-ics, s. [DIPLOMATIC, a.] The science of diplomas; that is, of ancient writings, literary and public documents, letters, deeds, decrees, charters, wills, &c., which has for its object the ascertaining of the authenticity, date, genuineness, &c.; the diplomatic science.

dī-plō-mā-tism, s. [Lat. diploma (genit. diplomatis), and Eng. suff. -ism.] Diplomacy.

dī-plō-mā-tist, s. [Fr. diplomate.] One who is engaged or skilled in diplomacy; a diplomat.

"There is no injustice in saying that diplomats, as a class, have always been more distinguished by their address, . . . than by generous enthusiasm or austere rectitude."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

dīp-lō-mīt-rī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Latin diplomitr(ium), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of flowerless plants, order Jungermanniaceæ (Scale-mosses.)

dīp-lō-mī-trī-ŭm, s. [Gr. diplōos=twofold, double, and mitrion, dimin. from mitra=a belt or girdle.]

Bot.: An old genus of flowerless plants, now made a synonym of Holzia.

dīp-lō-pāp-pē-sæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. diplomap-p(us), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ.]

Bot.: A sub-tribe of composite plants, tribe Asteroideæ.

dīp-lō-pāp-pūs, s. [Gr. diplōos=twofold, double, and pappos=the down on the seeds of certain plants such as the dandelion.]

Bot.: A genus of composite plants, the typical one of the sub-tribe Diplomapeæ.

dīp-lō-pēr-ist-ō-mī, s. pl. [Gr. diplōos=double; peri=around, about, and stoma=the mouth.]

Bot.: A term applied to certain Mosses which have two rows of hygrometric cellular teeth in the peristome.

dī-plō-pī-sæ, dīp-lō-pŷ, s. [Gr. diplōos=double, and ops (genit. opos)=the eye, sight; Fr. dioptrie.]

Med.: A disease of the eyes, in which the patient sees objects double. Usually the two images are almost entirely superposed, and one is more distinct than the other. The defect may be produced by the coöperation of two unequal eyes, or it may proceed from one. (Ganot.)

¶ There is an analogous disease called Triplopy (q. v.), in which the patient sees not double, but triple.

dīp-lō-pnō-i, s. pl. [Greek diplōos=twofold, double, and pnōs=a blowing, a breathing. So named because these fishes breathe both by lungs and gills.]

Ichthy.: The same as DIPNOT (q. v.).

dīp-lō-pōd, s. [DIPLOPODA.] A member of the Diplopoda (q. v.).

dī-plōp-ō-dæ, s. pl. [Gr. diplōos=double, and pous (genit. podos)=a foot.]

Entom.: [CHILOGNATHA.]

dī-plōp-tēr-æ, s. [Gr. diplōos=double, and pteron=a wing.]

Entom.: A division of Hymenopterous insects, comprising the three families Eumenidæ, Masaridæ, and Vespidæ. (See these words.)

dī-plōp-tēr-ŭs, s. [Greek diplōos=double, and pteron=a wing, a fin.]

Paleont.: A genus of fossil Ganoid fishes, belonging to the family Saurodipteri. They have two dorsal fins; scales rhomboidal and smooth; fins sub-acutely lobate. They are found in the Old Red Sandstone.

dīp-lō-pŷ, s. [DIPLOPIA.]

dīp-lō-stē-mōn-ōūs, a. [Greek diplōos=double, and stēmōn=a thread.]

Bot.: A term applied to those plants the flowers of which have twice as many stamens as petals.

dīp-lō-stŷ-lŭs, s. [Greek diplōos=double, and stylos=a pillar.]

Paleont.: A genus of small shrimp-like Crustaceans, from the coal formation of Nova Scotia, and so named by Mr. Salter from the two pairs of appendages to the last segment, tetson, or tail-plate. (Page.)

dīp-lō-tāx-īs, s. [Gr. diplōos=double, and taxis=arrangement.]

Bot.: A genus of Crucifereæ, comprising about twenty species of herbaceous plants, with yellow flowers, leaves pinnatifid, seeds oblong or oval, arranged in two rows.

dīp-lō-tēg-i-æ, s. [Greek diplōos=double, and tegōs, the same as stegos=a roof, a covering of a house.]

Bot.: An inferior dry pericarp, dehiscient or rupturing. Lindley places it in his class of Syncarpi, or compound fruit.

dīp-lō-zō-ōn, s. [Gr. diplōos=double, and zōon=an animal.]

Zoöl.: A genus of Entozoa, family Trematoda, consisting of parasitical worms which infest the gills of the bream, carp, roach, &c., and which have the appearance of two distinct bodies in a state of conjugation in the form of an X or St. Andrew's cross, the two bodies being of different sexes, soft, elongated, and flattened, and each terminated posteriorly by a transverse, oval, or almost quadrilateral expansion, furnished with four suckorial discs. (Griffith & Henfrey.)

dīp-nē-mō-nē-sæ, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and pneumōn=a lung.]

Entom.: A section of Araneidæ, or Spiders, comprising such as have two pulmonary sacs.

dīp-nōi, s. pl. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and pnōs=breath.]

1. Ichthy.: An order of fishes, small in number, but of great importance as exhibiting a distinct transition between the Fishes and Amphibia. So many, in fact, and so striking, are the points of resemblance between the two, that until recently the Lepidosiren was always made to constitute the lowest class of Amphibia. The highest authorities, however, now concur in placing it among the fishes, of which it constitutes the highest order. The order Dipnoi is defined by the following characters: the body is fish-like in shape; there is a skull with distinct cranial bones and a lower jaw, but the notochord is persistent, and there are no vertebral centra, nor an occipital condyle. The exo-skeleton consists of horny, overlapping scales, having the cycloid character. The pectoral and ventral limbs are both present, but have (in Lepidosiren) the form of awl-shaped, filiform, many-jointed organs of which the former only have a membranous fringe inferiorly. The ventral limbs are attached close to the anus, and the pectoral arch has a clavicle;

Ceratodus Fosteri.

but the scapular arch is attached to the occiput. The hinder part of the body is fringed by a vertical median fin. The heart has two auricles and one ventricle. The respiratory organs are twofold, consisting on the one hand of free filamentous gills, contained in a branchial chamber, which opens externally by a single vertical gill-slit, and on the other hand of true lungs in the form of a double cellular air-bladder, communicating with the oesophagus by means of an air-duct or trachea. The branchiæ are supported upon branchial arches, but these are not connected with the hyoid bone; and, in some cases at any rate, rudimentary external branchiæ exist as well. The nasal sacs open posteriorly into the throat. Until recently the two members of the order were the Lepidosiren paradoxa of South America, and the Lepidosiren (Protopterus) annectens of Africa. Recently, however, there has been discovered a most remarkable fish in the rivers of Queensland, which is referable to this order. This is the Ceratodus Fosteri, or Australian Mud-fish. [CERATODUS.] Dr. Günther considers the order Dipnoi as a sub-order of Ganoidæ. By Professor Owen they are called Protopteri. (Nicholson, &c.)

2. Paleont.: [CERATODUS.]

dīp-nō-ŭs, a. [DIPNOI.]

Surg.: Having two vent-holes. An epithet applied to wounds which pass through a part, and admit the air at both ends.

dī-pōd-i-dæ, s. [From dipus (q. v.), the typical genus, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zoöl.: The Jerboas, a widely distributed family of hopping rodents. The body is light and slender, the hind limbs much elongated, fore limbs very small, and the tail usually tufted at the end. It includes the American Jumping Mouse (Zapus or Meriones hudsonius), Dipus ægypticus, the Common Jerboa, the Jumping Hare of South Africa (Pedetes capensis), the Alactaga (Alactaga jaculus), &c. The family is found in Central Asia, Syria, and Arabia, South Africa and North America.

dīp-ō-dŷ, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and pous (genit. podos)=a foot.]

Pros.: Two metrical feet included in one measure, or a series of two feet.

dī-pō-lar, a. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. polar (q. v.).] Having two poles, as a magnetic bar.

dipped, dipt, pa. par. or a. [DIP, v.]

Dip-pel, s. [See definition.] The name of a chemist in the seventeenth century.

Dippel's oil, s.

Comm.: Purified hartshorn oil, or animal oil, Oleum animale Dippelii, Ol. cornu cervi rectificatum. An oil prepared as a medicine by Dippel, from crude fetid animal oil (Ol. cornu cervi fetidum), by submitting it to repeated rectification, per se, till it

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mātē, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fāll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

left no longer any black residue. The oil thus obtained is colorless, highly refractive, smells somewhat like cinnamon, and has a burning taste. It was valued as an anti-spasmodic and nervous stimulant, but is no longer used in medicine. Taken in excess, it is poisonous. Animal oil is now rectified with sand, water, or lime. Nearly all the animal oil of commerce is now obtained by the destructive distillation of bones, as a by-product in the preparation of bone black. [BONE OIL.]

dip-pēr, *dip-pere, s. [Eng. dip; -er.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. One who dips in the water or other liquid.
2. A vessel used for dipping or lading water or other liquid; a ladle.

II. Technically:

1. Ch. Hist.: A name given in contempt to the sect of Baptists, which in the United States are called Dunkers.

"Our townsmen, since of floods they must turn skippers, Will change religion too, and so turn dippers."
Cleveland: Poems, p. 18.

2. Astron.: A name given to the seven stars in the constellation of the Great Bear, from their being arranged in the form of a dipper, or ladle. (For peculiarities of this constellation see illustration.)

"One of the most notable examples of the constant and yet almost imperceptible changes taking place in our firmament is to be found in the motions of the seven bright stars forming the 'Big Dipper' in the constellation Ursa Major. Dr. Huggins, the eminent English astronomer, has found by means of the spectroscopic that five of these stars are moving in the same direction, with nearly the same velocity, and receding from the earth at the rate of about twenty miles per second, which seems to indicate that they are associated with each other in some mysterious way at present unknown to astronomers. The late Professor Proctor referred to them as the 'drifting stars,' and this community of motion, where groups of stars appear to be traveling as systems, he termed 'star-drift,' of which there are many interesting examples to be found in various parts of the heavens. After a careful and long-continued study of the motions of the seven stars in the 'Dipper' Professor Flammarion, a distinguished French astronomer, has been able to represent the outlines formed by them at various times in the past and those which they will form in the distant future. One hundred thousand years ago, according to his ingenious calculations, the stars now forming the familiar 'Big Dipper' were arranged in the outline of a large and irregular-shaped cross; and one hundred thousand years hence they will assume the outline of an elongated and inverted 'Dipper'—very different from the one we now see—which will stretch over a large extent of the sky, and the two 'pointers,' now so convenient to casual observers of the heavens, will then no longer indicate the position of the 'pole star' as they do at present, for there are no 'fixed stars,' and each one of those distant suns, flaming in the immensity of space, is swept along in a movement so rapid that the human mind can hardly conceive it, and almost grows weary even in its contemplation."—Professor Arthur K. Bartlett, in Chicago Inter Ocean, Feb. 18, 1894.

3. Ornith.: Cinclus aquaticus, a genus of birds belonging to the family Merulidae and order Passeres. The bird derives its name from its habit of dipping or bowing the head while sitting, at the same time flitting up its tail.

4. Phot.: An instrument used for immersing plates in upright baths containing nitrate of silver, and withdrawing the same after sensitizing. They are slender, flat strips of hard rubber, wood, glass, porcelain, and sometimes silver wire, having short projections upon which to rest the edge of the plate, which stands nearly upright in the bath while the chemical changes take place.

dip-pīng, pr. par., a. & s. [DIP, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of plunging or immersing in a liquid for a short time.

"That which is dyed with many dippings is ingrained, and can very hardly be washed out."—Bp. Taylor. Of Repentance, ch. v., § 4.

2. The act of bending, or inclining downward.
3. The act of baptizing by immersion.

II. Technically:

1. Brass-work: The process of brightening ornamental brass-work. The grease is removed by heat or lye, the work is pickled in dilute aquafortis, scoured with sand and water, washed, dipped in a bath of pure nitrous acid for an instant, washed, rubbed with beech sawdust, burnished and lacquered.

2. Tin-work: Plunging sheet-iron plates in the pickle or the tin-bath in tinning.

3. Candle-making: Wicks in the tallow-vat.

4. Dyeing: The wool or fabric in the dye-tub.

5. Paper-making: The paper form in the pulp.

6. Leather-dressing: The Scotch term for the dubbing of American and English curriers. It consists of boiled-oil, fish-oil, and tallow.

7. Phot.: Immersing the collodionized plate in a sensitizing bath.

8. Min.: The angle at which the mineral vein is inclined; the dip.

dipping-frame, s.

1. Candle-making: A frame from which candle-wicks are suspended while dipping into the vat of melted tallow. [CANDLE.]

2. Dyeing: A frame on which the fabric is stretched and immersed in dyeing with indigo.

dipping-needle, s. A magnetized needle, moving in a vertical plane, on an axis which passes at right angles exactly through the center of gravity. When thus mounted it will, if placed anywhere not in the magnetic equator, dip or point downward. The position of the magnetic pole can thus be determined from the intersection of two or more lines formed by making experiments with the dipping-needle at various places. The inclination or dip of the magnetized needle was not known to the Chinese, who had discovered its variation during the twelfth century. This element of terrestrial magnetism appears to have been discovered by Robert Norman, a compass-maker of Ratcliff, London, who detected the dip, and published the fact in 1576. He contrived the dipping-needle, and found the dip at London to be 71° 50'. [DIP-CIRCLE.] Captain Sir James Ross, the celebrated Arctic navigator, reached the magnetic pole, latitude 70° 5' 17" N., and longitude 96° 46' 45" W., on the first of June, 1831. The amount of dip was 89° 59'.

dipping-pan, s.

Stereotyping: A square, cast-iron tray in which the floating-plate and plaster-cast are placed for obtaining a stereotype cast. The floating-plate is to form the back of the stereotype, and the mold the face; the dipping-pan forms the flask, and is plunged beneath the surface of the metal in an iron pot. The metal runs in at holes through the lid and forces apart the plate and the mold. [Knight.]

dipping-tube, s. A tube for taking microscopic objects out of a liquid. [FISHING-TUBE.] Dipping-tubes vary in length from about five inches to a foot, and in caliber from $\frac{1}{8}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ inch. One end is coated outside with sealing-wax and spirit, or some other colored liquid.

dip-ri-ōn, s. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and prion=a saw.]

Palæont.: A synonym of Diplograpsus (q. v.), the serrated cells on each side the central axis giving the organism the appearance of a double saw.

dip-ri-ō-nid-i-an, a. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, prion=a saw, and Eng. adj. suff. -idian.]

Palæont.: A term applied to those fossil Hydrozoa in which the polypary possesses a row of cells on each side.

"The diprionid Graptolites, with rare exceptions, are confined to the Lower Silurian and Cambrian Rocks."—Nicholson: Man. of Palæont., p. 82.

dī-pris-māt-ic, a. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. prismatic (q. v.).]

1. Optics: Doubly prismatic.

2. Crystallog.: Having cleavages parallel to the sides of a four-sided vertical prism, and, at the same time, to a horizontal prism.

dī-prō-par-gyl, s. [Etym. uncertain.]

Chem.: C_6H_5 , or $HC \equiv C \cdot CH_2 \cdot CH_2 \cdot C \equiv CH$. Obtained by distilling diallyl-tetra-bromide, $C_6H_{10}Br_4$, with a large excess of caustic potash, which converts it into dibromodiallyl, $C_6H_8Br_2$, which is then boiled with alcoholic potash. Dipropargyl is a pungent liquid, boiling at 85°. With ammoniacal solution of cuprous chloride it gives a greenish-yellow precipitate, $C_6H_4(Cu_2)^+ + 2H_2O$, and with a silver solution a white precipitate, $C_6H_4Ag_2 + 2H_2O$, which blackens on exposure to the light, and explodes when heated to 100°. Dipropargyl is isomeric with benzene, which boils at 81°. Its density is less than benzene, being 0.82 instead of 0.89. It is much less stable, being very easily polymerized, and forms an addition compound with eight atoms of bromine, $C_6H_8Br_8$, which melts at 140°.

dī-prō-pyl, s. [HEXANE.]

dī-prōt-ō-dōn, s. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold; prōtos=first, and odous (genit. odontos)=a tooth.]

Palæont.: A gigantic Pachydermoid Marsupial mammal, resembling in most essential respects the Kangaroo, the dentition especially showing many points of affinity. The hind limbs, however, were not so disproportionately long as in the Kangaroos. It is found in the Pleistocene or Upper Tertiary beds of Australia, and derives its name from the large scalpriform character of its incisors or front teeth.

dī-prōt-ō-dōnt, a. [DIPROTODON.]

Zool.: Having the same structure of tooth as in the genus Diprotodon (q. v.).

"In the Diprotodont forms . . ."—Nicholson: Palæont., ii. 289.

dī-prōt-ō-dōn-tī-a (tī as shī), s. pl. [DIPROTODON.]

Zool.: A primary group of the Marsupialia, consisting of genera which have only two lower incisors, the canines rudimentary or wanting, and the molars generally with broad grinding crowns. It contains the Macropodidae (Kangaroos), the Phalangistidae (Phalangers), &c.

dip-sā-çē-æ, dip-sā-cā-çē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. dipsac(us), the typical genus, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: The Teazel family, a natural order of exogenous plants, consisting of herbs or undershrubs, with opposite or verticillate leaves, and capitate or verticillate flowers, surrounded by a many-leaved involucre. They are found in the south of Europe, the Levant, and the Cape of Good Hope. Lindley enumerates six genera and 160 species.

dip-sā-cūs, s. [Gr. dipsas=(1) a serpent, (2) a plant; dipsao=to thirst.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, the typical one of the order Dipsacaceæ. They are erect, pilose, or prickly biennial herbs, with lilac, white, or yellow flowers. The dried heads of Dipsacus fullonum (Fuller's Teazel) are used in dressing cloth. Some of the species have febrifugal properties. The name is derived from the bases of the leaves of some of the species being coronate in such a way as to enclose a cavity, which contains water ready to allay thirst. The water thus contained was once considered good for bleared eyes. [TEAZEL.]

dip-sād-i-dæ, s. pl. [Gr. dipsas, (genit. dipsados)=a venomous serpent, whose bite caused intense thirst, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idae.]

Zool.: A family of Colubrine Snakes, tribe Suseptæ. They have a long, compressed, slender body, generally narrower than the head. Both jaws have sometimes fangs. (Dallas.) Type Dipsas, in some classifications placed under the Colubridæ, using that term for the whole group of Colubrine Snakes.

dip-sās, s. [Gr. dipsas=a serpent.]

I. Ord. Lang.: A serpent, whose bite was fabled to produce unquenchable thirst.

"Cerastes horn'd, hydrous, and ellops drear, And dipsas." Milton: P. L., x. 526.

II. Zoology:

1. A genus of non-venomous snakes belonging to the family Colubridæ: body long and compressed; vertical scales square; lateral scales linear; subcaudal plates double.

2. A genus of fresh-water bivalves, intermediate between Unio and Anodonta.

dip-sēt-ic, a. [Gr. dipsētikos, from dipsao=to thirst.] Having a tendency to excite thirst.

dip-sō-mā-nī-a, s. [Gr. dipsao=to thirst, and mania=madness.]

Med.: Alcoholism; the brain-fever of drunkards, or delirium tremens (q. v.).

dip-sō-mā-nī-āc, s. [Gr. dipsō=to thirst, and Eng. maniac (q. v.).] One who is subject to dipsomania.

dip-sō-mā-nī-āc-al, a. [Gr. dipsao=to thirst, and Eng. maniacal (q. v.).] Of or pertaining to dipsomania.

dip-sōp-a-thy, s. [Gr. dipsao=to thirst, and pathos=suffering.]

Med.: A mode of treatment which consists in abstaining from drinks.

dip-sō-sis, s. [Gr. dipsao=to thirst.]

Med.: A morbid thirst; excessive desire of drinking.

dip-tēr-a, s. [Gr. dipteros=two-winged; dis=twice, twofold, and pteron=a wing.]

Entom.: An order of insects, such as gnats, house-flies, &c., that have only two membranous wings developed, the hind pair being represented by two small knobbed organs, called halteres, or poiers, whose exact function is as yet undetermined. The mouth is suctorial, and forms a proboscis composed of mandibles, maxillæ, and a central piece, or tongue (glossarium), the labium, often with a fleshy, terminal lip, serving as a sheath; frequently some of these parts are converted into chitinous setæ, or into lancet-shaped bodies, with which their owners pierce the tissues of animals or plants, whose juices, thus set free, they feed on, sucking them up through the tubular proboscis. They have two large compound eyes, often composed of thousands of facets, on either side of the head; and three small ocelli on the top. The antennæ are variable in form and size, but more commonly are very short, and composed of three joints. The foot, in addition to a pair of strong claws, is furnished with two, rarely three, cushions, covered beneath with fine hair-like suckers, which, aided by a viscid secretion that renders adhesion more perfect, enables these insects to crawl on the under surfaces of objects however smooth. The metamorphosis in Diptera is complete, and the larvæ are generally destitute of feet. Many of the Diptera are useful scavengers in the larval state, but others are very injurious—e. g., the Hessian Fly (Cecidomyia destructor) to wheat-crops, the Crane Fly (Tipula oleracea) to grass lands. In the perfect state they are too often pests to man and beast, sucking the blood or depositing their eggs in or on their bodies, causing tumors, ulcerations, and death. The species are very numerous and world-wide in their distribution. In the fossil state they have been found as far back as the beginning of the Secondary period. The classification of the Diptera is a matter of some difficulty. By some authors they are divided into three sub-orders: Nemocera, Brachycera, and Pupipara; by others into five tribes: Nemocera, Notacantha, Tanystoma, Athericera, and Pupipara; while some naturalists even include the Fleas, Aphaniptera.

dip-tēr-ā-čē-ə, dip-tēr-ō-car-pē-ə, s. pl. [Gr. dipteros=two-winged; di=dis=twice, twofold; pteron=a wing; karpōs=fruit, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ, -ecæ.]

Bot.: An order of Exogenous trees, with alternate leaves, having an involute vernation, and deciduous convolute stipules. They are found in India, and especially in the eastern islands of the Indian Archipelago. There are eight genera and forty-eight species known. The trees belonging to this order are handsome and ornamental, and abound in resinous juice. Dryobalanops camphora, or aromatica, a native of Sumatra, when old, furnishes a kind of camphor, secreted in crystalline masses, naturally into cavities in the wood. When young, it yields, on incision, a pale yellow liquid, consisting of resin, and a volatile oil having a camphoraceous odor. The Indian copal, or gum, the gum animi of commerce, is the inspissated varnish obtained from Vateria indica. The fruit of this tree yields to boiling water the celebrated butter of Canara, or Pineal tallow.

dip-tēr-āds, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. dipter(aceæ), and Eng., &c., pl. suff. -ads.] Bot.: The English name given by Lindley to the order Dipteraceæ (q. v.).

dip-tēr-āl, a. & s. [Gr. dipteros=two-winged; di=dis=twice, twofold, and pteron=a wing.]

A. As adjective:

1. Arch.: A term applied to a temple having a double range of columns all round; it usually had eight in the front row of the end porticoes, and fifteen at the sides, the columns at the angles being included in both.

2. Entom.: Having only two wings; dipterous.

B. As substantive:

Arch.: A dipteron, or dipteral temple.

dip-tēr-ān, s. [DIPTERA.]

Entom.: A member of the Diptera (q. v.), a dipterous insect.

dip-tēr-ī-dā, s. pl. [Gr. dipteros=two-winged; di=dis=twice, twofold, pteron=a wing, a fin, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idææ.]
Palæont.: In Prof. Owen's classification, the first family of his Lepidodontoidei, a sub-order of Ganoidian fishes. (Owen: Palæontology, 1860.)

dip-tēr-ix, dip-tēr-ŷx, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and pteryx=a wing.]

Bot.: A genus of Leguminous plants, consisting of trees with abruptly-pinnate leaves. The name is derived from the two upper lobes of the calyx, which appear like wings. They are natives of the northern parts of South America. The fragrant seeds of Dipterix odorata are known as Tonka or Tonquin-bean, and are used to scent snuff. [TONKABEAN.]

dip-tēr-ō-car-pē-ə, s. pl. [DIPTERACEÆ.]

dip-tēr-ō-car-pūs, s. [Gr. dipteros: di=dis=twice, twofold; pteron=a wing, and karpōs=fruit.]

Bot.: A genus of trees, the type of the order Dipteroearpææ, or Dipteraceæ. They have showy white flowers mixed with red. Various species yield a substance like Balsam of Copaiva.

dipteroearpous-balsam, s. Wood-oil. The volatile oil of this balsam (which is also known as Gurjun balsam) may be distinguished by the splendid violet color produced on dissolving it in about twenty parts of CS₂, and adding a cooled mixture of strong nitric and sulphuric acids. Cod-liver oil and valerian oil likewise exhibit a fine violet color, but for a short time only. (Watts: Dict. Chem.)

dip-tēr-ōn, dip-tēr-ōs, s. [Gr. dipteros, neut. dip-teron=having two wings.]

Arch.: A temple having a double row or columns on each of its four sides. Such an edifice is said to be dipteral.

dip-tēr-ōūs, a. [Gr. dipteros=two-winged; di=dis=twice, twofold, and pteron=a wing.]

1. Bot.: A term applied to seeds, the margins of which are prolonged, so as to present the appearance of wings.

2. Entom.: Two-winged; pertaining or belonging to the order Diptera (q. v.).

dip-tēr-ūs, s. [Gr. dipteros=two-winged; di=dis=twice, twofold, and pteron=a wing, a fin.]

Palæont.: A genus of fossil Ganoid fishes, the type of the family Ctenodipterini. The body is covered with cycloid, overlapping, smooth scales; the head is protected by a kind of helmet formed of the ankylosed cranial bones, and the teeth are conical in form and nearly equal in size. The two dorsal fins are placed far back; tail heterocercal. All the species are Devonian. (Nicholson.)

dip-tēr-ŷg-ī-ān, a. & s. [Greek di=dis=twice, twofold, and pteryx (genit. pterygos)=a wing, a fin.]

A. As adj.: A term applied to those fishes which have only two dorsal fins.

B. As subst.: A member of a family of dipterygian fishes.

dip-tôte, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and ptōtikos=pertaining to a case; ptōsis=a case; ptōtō=to fall.]

Gram.: A noun which has only two cases.

dip-tŷch, s. [Low Lat. diptycha; Gr. diptycha=a pair of writing tablets; neut. pl. of diptychos=folded, doubled; di=dis=twice, twofold; ptyktos=folded; ptygō=to fold.]

1. Antiq.: Double-folded tablets made of carved ivory on the outer side and wax on the inner. They were used as a register of the names of consuls and other magistrates, and derived their name from being formed of two tables or leaves. Tablets of three leaves were called triptychs (q. v.).

2. Eccles.: A list or register of bishops, martyrs, &c., containing a double catalogue, in one of which were entered the names of the living, and in the other the names of the dead, for whom prayers were to be offered during the mass.

"The commemoration of saints was made out of the diptychs of the church, as appears by multitudes of places in St. Austin."—Stillington.

dip-tŷ-chŭm, dip-tŷ-chŭs, s. [DIPTYCH.]

di-pŷs, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and pous=a foot.]

1. Zool.: The Jerboas, a genus of rodents, the type of the family Dipodidae (q. v.). It includes about twenty species. Dipus ægypticus is a native of north-eastern Africa, Arabia, and south-western Asia. It lives in burrows, and is generally gregarious. When going along quietly, the jerboa walks and runs by alternate steps of the hind feet; but when there is occasion for rapidity it springs from both hind feet at the same time, covering so much ground at each leap, and touching the ground so momentarily between them, that its motion is more like that of a bird skimming close to the surface of the ground than that of a fourfooted beast. It is about six inches long, with a tail eight inches long, exclusive of the tuft at the end. Its upper surface is of a grayish sand color, the lower surface white; the tail pale yellowish above, and white beneath; the tip white, with an arrow-shaped black mark on the upper surface.

2. Palæont.: The remains of a species of Dipus have been discovered in the Miocene deposits in France.

di-pŷ-re, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and pyr=fire, from the two effects of fusion and phosphorescence.]

Min.: A tetragonal, transparent, or translucent mineral, occurring in rather coarse crystals in Metamorphic rocks. It is found in the Pyrenees. When heated before the blow-pipe it first becomes phosphorescent and then fuses. Specific gravity 2.646; hardness, 5-5.5. Composition: Silica, 55.5-60; alumina, 22.68-24.8; lime, 6.35-10; soda, 0.94; potassa, protoxide of manganese, and magnesia, traces; water, 2-4.55. (Dana.)

di-pŷ-rē-noūs, a. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and pyrēn=the stone of stone fruit.]

Bot.: Containing two pyrenes or stones.

di-quīn-ō-līne, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and Eng. quinoline (q. v.).]

Chem.: C₁₀H₁₄N₂. A yellow oil, formed by boiling quinoline with sodium. It forms crystalline hydrochloride of a splendid red color, which forms double salts with platinic chloride.

di-rā-dī-ā-tion, s. [Low Lat. diradiatio, from di=dis=apart, and radiatio=radiation; radius=a ray.] The emission and diffusion of rays of light from a luminous body.

dīr-ca, s. [Lat. Dirce; Gr. Dirka=a fountain near Thebes in Boeotia, sacred to the Muses. In allusion to the wet places in which the plant grows.]

Bot.: A genus of plants belonging to the natural order Thymeleaceæ, and consisting of a single species, Dirca palustris, the Leather-wood of America. The bark is tough, and is made into ropes and paper; in small doses it is used medicinally as a cathartic, but in strong doses it produces vomiting. The fruit is said to be narcotic.

dīr-dŭm, dīr-dīm, s. [Gael. diardan=anger, passion.]

1. An uproar, a tumult, a disturbance.

"It's just because—just that the dirdums a' about yon man's pokmanky."—Scott. Rob Roy, ch. xiv.

2. An evil chance, damage; disagreeable consequences.

3. A severe reprehension or reproof; a scolding.

"My word! but she's no blate to show her nose here. I gied her such a dirdim the last time I got her sitting in our laundry, as might have served her for a twelvemonth."—Petticoat Tales, i. 280.

4. A blow.

"It may be some of you get a clash of the kirk's craft, that's a business I warrant you, a fair dirdim of their synagogue."—M. Bruce. Soul-Confirmation, p. 14.

dir-e, a. [Lat. dirus=dreadful.] Dreadful, fearful, horrible, dismal, terrible, mournful, lamentable, sad.

"Oh! ere that dire disgrace shall blast my fame, O'erwhelm me, earth! and hide a monarch's shame."
Pope: Homer's Iliad, iv. 218, 219.

¶ Used adverbially in such compounds as dire-looking (Milton); dire-laboring, dire-muttered (Thomson), &c.

dī-rēct, a., adv. & s. [Lat. directus=straight, pa. par. of dirigere to set straight, to direct; Fr. direct; Ital. diritto.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) Straight; directed in a straight line from one body or place to another.

"He said, and on His Son with rays direct Milton: P. L., vi. 719, 720.

(2) Straight; not curved or crooked; right.

"The ships . . . consequently must needs encounter when they either advance toward one another in direct lines, or meet in the intersection of cross lines."—Bentley.

(3) Nearest, shortest, most expeditious; as, to take the direct road to a place.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Leading or tending to an end or result, as by a straight line; not circuitous.

"My direct road to enjoy a more flowery path."—Melmoth: Pliny, bk. i, lett. ii.

(2) Not collateral; in the line of descent from father to son; as, a descendant in a direct line.

(3) Immediate; not received or gained indirectly.

"In mine own direct knowledge."—Shakesp. All's Well, iii. 6.

(4) Plain, express, to the point.

"Yield me a direct answer."—Shakesp. Measure for Measure, iv. 2.

(5) Open, plain, straightforward, sincere, honest, upright.

"There be, that are in nature faithful and sincere, and plain and direct, not crafty and involved."—Bacon.

(6) Assessed or paid directly. [DIRECT TAXATION.]

II. Technically:

1. Astron.: Applied to the motion of a planet when it is in the same direction as the sun moves among the fixed stars—viz., to the left of an observer looking south; in other words, the direct motion of a planet is toward the east. (Airy: Popular Astronomy (6th ed.), pp. 91, 123, 124.) [RETROGRADE.]

"The earth was revolving from left to right, or in the way which we call direct."—Airy: Popular Astronomy (6th ed.), p. 158.

2. Logic: In direct demonstration the premises employed in each step of the reasoning, are either axioms, definitions, or truths previously demonstrated. In the indirect demonstration, or reductio ad absurdum, the premises or some of the steps may depend upon one or more hypotheses.

B. As adverb:

1. Directly; in a straight line.

"God Phebus direct descending down."
Chaucer: Test. of Cresseide.

2. Directly, at once, immediately.

3. To the point.

"Direct or indirectly then To answer, all is one."
Warner: Albion's England, ix. 51.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; plne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

*C. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: A direction.

"It is a direct, a reference, a dash of the Holy Ghost's pen."—Adams: Works, ii. 110. (Davies.)

2. Music: A sign (W) used at the bottom of a page or even at the end of a line of music, to indicate the note next to be sung or played; acting as a catchword in printed books. It was formerly universal, but is now very seldom, if ever, used.

¶ For the difference between direct and straight see STRAIGHT.

direct-action, a.

¶ Direct-action steam-engine: A form of steam-engines in which the piston-rod or cross-head is connected directly by a rod with the crank, dispensing with working-beams and side-levers. They may be classed generally under three heads: those which obtain the parallelism of the piston-rod by means of the system of jointed rods called a parallel motion; those which use guides or sliding surfaces for this purpose; and those denominated oscillating-engines, in which the cylinder is hung upon pivots and follows the oscillations of the crank. In Napier's direct-action steam-engine the beam is retained, but only for the purpose of working the pumps.

direct-draft, s. In steam-boilers, when the hot air and smoke pass off in a single direct flue. In contradistinction to a reverting, a wheel, or a split draft.

direct-interval, s.

Music: [INTERVAL.]

direct-motion, s.

Music: [MOTION.]

direct-proportion, s.

Math.: [PROPORTION.]

direct-radial, s.

Perspect.: A right line from the eye perpendicular to the picture.

direct-ratio, s.

Math.: [RATIO.]

direct-taxation, s.

Polit. Econ.: The assessing of taxes directly on real estate, as houses and lands, or on income; as opposed to indirect taxation, which is assessed on some article of commerce, and is thus paid indirectly by the purchaser.

di-rēct, di-recte*, v. t. & i. [From the adj. (q. v.). In Fr. diriger; Sp. & Port. dirigir; Ital. dirigere.]

A. Transitive:

1. To point, set, or lay in a direct or straight line toward a place or object.

"And he sent Judah before him unto Joseph, to direct his face unto Goshen."—Gen. xli. 20.

2. To point out or show the direct or right road to.

"Direct me, if it be your will,

Where great Aulidius lies."—Shakesp.: Coriol., iv. 4.

3. To address, or inscribe with an address or direction.

"A cargo of copes, images, beads, crosses, and censers arrived at Leith directed to Lord Perth."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

4. To address, speak, or utter to a person.

"Words sweetly placed and modestly directed,"

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I., v. 3.

5. To aim or point; to design, to intend.

"Offenders against whom Sacheverell's clause was directed."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

6. To lead, to guide, to regulate, to prescribe a course to.

"Some good direct my judgment!"

Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, ii. 7.

7. To instruct, to order, to command, to give instructions to.

"I'll first direct my men what they shall do."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, iv. 2.

8. To rule, to manage, to administer; to act as leader or head of.

"... undergone the trouble of really directing the administration."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

B. Intrans.: To guide, to lead, to give instructions, to order, to prescribe.

"She hath directed

How I shall take her from her father's house,"

Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, ii. 4.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between direct and regulate: "To direct is personal, it supposes authority; to regulate is general, it supposes superior information. An officer directs the movements of his men in military operations; the steward or master of the ceremonies regulates the whole concerns of an entertainment: the director is often a man in power; the regulator is always the man of business. . . . To direct is always used with regard to others; to regulate frequently with regard to ourselves. One person directs another according to his better judgment; he regulates his own conduct by principles or circumstances." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between direct and to conduct, see CONDUCT.

di-rēct-ēd, pa. par. or a. [DIRECT, v.]

di-rēc*-tēr, di-rēc-tōr, s. [DIRECTOR.]

di-rēc-tīng, pr. par., a. & s. [DIRECT, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. The act of laying, placing, or setting in a direct line with any object or place.

2. The act of addressing, or inscribing with the address or direction of a person.

3. The act of instructing, guiding, leading, or ordering.

directing-circle, s.

Fort.: A ring used in giving the proper shape in making gabions.

directing-line, s.

Perspect.: The line in which an original plane would cut the directing-plane (q. v.).

directing-plane, s.

Persp.: A plane passing through the point of sight parallel to the plane of the picture.

directing-point, s.

Persp.: The point where any original line meets the directing-plane.

di-rēc-tīon, s. [Lat. directio=a setting straight, a directing, from directus, pa. par. of dirigo=to set straight, to direct; Fr. direction; Sp. direccion; Ital. direzione.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of directing or setting in a direct line for any object or place.

2. The use, end, or object toward which anything is directed.

3. The course or line taken by a body, or in which it moves.

"They fired their carbines, and galloped off in different directions to give the alarm."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

4. A point or position toward which one looks.

5. The act of addressing, or inscribing with an address.

6. A superscription of a letter, parcel, &c., giving the name and residence of the person for whom it is intended; an address.

7. The act of directing, turning, or applying to any end, object, or purpose.

"The direction of good works to a good end is the only principle that distinguishes charity."—Smalridge.

8. The act of directing, regulating, leading, or administering.

"The supreme direction of liberal education."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

9. An order, command, instruction, whether verbal or written.

"The state implicitly obeyed the direction of a single mind."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

*10. Regularity, adjustment.

"All nature is but art unknown to thee;

All chance, direction which thou canst not see,"

Pope: Essay on Man, i. 289, 290.

11. A body of directors; a directorate.

II. Technically:

Eccles.: The guidance or function of a spiritual adviser or director.

¶ (1) Angle of direction:

Mech.: An angle contained by the lines of direction of two conspiring forces.

(2) Line of direction:

(a) Gunnery: The direct line in which a gun is laid.

(b) Mech.: The line in which a body moves or endeavors to move.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between direction, address, and superscription: "The direction may serve to direct to places as well as to persons; the address is never used but in direct application to the person; the superscription has more respect to the thing than to the person. The direction may be written or verbal; the address in this sense is [nearly] always written; the superscription must not only be written, but either on or over some other thing: a direction is given to such as go in search of persons and places; it ought to be clear and particular; an address is put either on a card, a letter, or in a book: it ought to be suitable to the station and situation of the person addressed; a superscription is placed at the head of other writings or over tombs and pillars: it ought to be appropriate."

(2) He thus discriminates between direction and order: "Direction contains most of instruction in it; order most of authority. Directions should be followed; orders obeyed. It is necessary to direct those who are unable to act for themselves; it is necessary to order those whose business it is to execute the orders. . . . Directions extend to the moral conduct of others, as well as to the ordinary concerns of life; orders are confined to the personal convenience of the individual. A parent directs a child as to his behavior in company, or as to his conduct when he enters life; a teacher directs his pupil in the choice of books, or in the distribution of his studies; the master gives orders to his attendants to be in waiting for him at a certain hour; or he gives orders to his tradesmen to provide what is necessary." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

*9. Honestly, straightforwardly.

"I have dealt most directly in thy affair."—Shakesp.: Othello, iv. 2.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between directly, immediately, instantly, and instantaneously: "Directly is most applicable to the actions of men; immediately and instantly to either actions or events. Directly refers to the interruptions which may intentionally delay the commencement of any work; immediately in general refers to the space of time that intervenes. A diligent person goes directly to his work: he suffers nothing to draw him aside; good news is immediately spread abroad upon its arrival. . . . Immediately and instantly, or instantaneously, both mark a quick succession of events, but the latter in a much stronger degree than the former. Immediately is negative: it expresses simply that nothing intervenes; instantly is positive, signifying the very existing moment in which the thing happens. A person who is of a willing disposition goes or runs immediately to the assistance of another; but the ardor of affection impels him to fly instantly to his relief, as he sees the danger . . . A course of proceeding is direct, the consequences are immediate, and the effects instantaneous. (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) directly-proportional, a.

dis, s. [Ger.]

Mus.: The German term for D sharp, and also, according to a curious former Viennese custom, for E flat. (Grove.)

dis-, pref. A prefix or inseparable particle largely used in composition to express privation or negation, as to disarm=to deprive of arms; to disagree=not to agree. It is from the Lat. dis=apart, and this is from an older dis, from Lat. duo=two. The Lat. dis became des in Old French; French dé: this appears in several words, as in défait, défy, &c., where the prefix must be carefully distinguished from that due to Lat. de. Again, in some cases dis is a late substitution for an older des, which is the Old French des: thus Chaucer has desarmen, from the Old French des-armen, in the sense of disarm. (Skeat.)

di-sa, s. [Etymol. uncertain.]

Bot.: A genus of plants, belonging to the Orchidaceæ, or Orchids. Disa grandiflora is found on Table Mountain at an elevation of 3,582 feet, the only known locality; for it is in a marshy bottom, near the eastern extremity of the summit, where it is abundant among rushes on the margins of small pools and streamlets in a black boggy soil. Two other rare species are also seen there, D. ferruginea and D. tenuifolia.

And some unto him kneel, and some about him dance." G. Fletcher: Christ's Triumph, pt. ii.

dis-ad-vant'-age (age as ig), dis-ad-vaunt-age, dis-a-vaunt-age, s. [Pref. dis, and Eng. advantage, s. (q. v.).]

1. An injury, detriment, or hurt done.
"And to no wight do no disadvantage."
Chaucer: La Belle Dame.

2. A loss, injury, detriment, or hurt suffered.

3. An unfavorable position or condition; a state in which one person or thing stands or contrasts unfavorably with another.

"Even if the place should, notwithstanding all disadvantages, be able to repel a larger army."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

¶ (1) At disadvantage, at a disadvantage: In a disadvantageous or unfavorable manner, position, or state.

"We have at disadvantage fought."
Shakesp.: Coriolanus, i. 6.

(2) To disadvantage: So as to suffer loss, injury, or detriment to property, interest, credit, or fame; as, He sold it to disadvantage; To appear to disadvantage.

¶ (3) Rabbinic discrimination between disadvantage, injury, hurt, detriment, and prejudice: "The disadvantage is rather the absence of a good; the injury is a positive evil: the want of education may frequently be a disadvantage to a person by retarding his advancement; the ill word of another may be an injury by depriving of friends. The disadvantage, therefore, is applied to such things as are of an adventitious nature: the injury to that which is of essential importance. The hurt, detriment, and prejudice, are all species of injuries. Injury, in general, implies whatever ill befalls an object by the external action of other objects, whether taken in relation to physical or moral evil to persons, or to things; hurt is that species of injury which is produced by more direct violence; too close application to study is injurious to the health; reading by an improper light is hurtful to the eyes: so in a moral sense, the light reading which a circulating library supplies is often injurious to the morals of young people: all violent affections are hurtful to the mind. The detriment and prejudice are species of injury which affect only the outward circumstances of a person: the former implying what may lessen the value of an object, the latter what may lower it in the esteem of others. Whatever affects the stability of a merchant's credit is highly detrimental to his interests; whatever is prejudicial to the character of a man should not be made the subject of indiscriminate conversation. It is prudent to conceal that which will be to our disadvantage, unless we are called upon to make the acknowledgment. There is nothing material that is not exposed to the injuries of time, if not to those of actual violence. Excesses of every kind carry their own punishment with them, for they are always hurtful to the body. The price of a book is often detrimental to its sale. The intemperate zeal or the inconsistent conduct of religious professors is highly prejudicial to the spread of religion." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dis-ad-vant-age* (age as ig), v. t. [Pref. dis, and Eng. advantage (q. v.).] To cause a disadvantage, loss, injury, or detriment to; to prejudice.

"All other violences are so far from advancing Christianity, that they extremely weaken and disadvantage it." —More: Deacy of Piety.

dis-ad-vant-age-a-ble* (age as ig), a. [Pref. dis, and Eng. advantageable (q. v.).] Causing disadvantage or injury; disadvantageous, detrimental.

"Hasty selling is commonly as disadvantageable as in-ter-est." —Bacon.

dis-ad-vant-aged* (aged as igd), pa. par. or a. [DISADVANTAGED, v.] dis-ād-van-tā-geous, a. [Pref. dis, and Eng. advantageous (q. v.).]

1. Contrary to advantage, profit, or interest; attended with or causing disadvantage, injury, detriment, or prejudice; prejudicial, detrimental, injurious, or unfavorable to one's interest.

"The divided power of the consular tribunals had doubtless been found disadvantageous." —Lewis: Cred. Early Rom. Hist. (1855), ch. xiii., pt. i.

*2. Unfavorable, prejudiced, biased.

"Whatever disadvantageous sentiments we may entertain of mankind." —Hume: Essay on Prin. of Government.

dis-ād-van-tā-geous-ly, adv. [Pref. dis, and Eng. advantageously (q. v.).] In a disadvantageous manner; so as to cause or suffer disadvantage, injury, detriment, or prejudice.

"An approving nod or smile serves to drive you on, and make you display yourselves more disadvantageously." —Government of the Tongue.

dis-ād-van-tā-geous-ness, s. [Pref. dis, and Eng. advantageousness (q. v.).] The quality or state of being disadvantageous; unfavorableness.

dis-ad-vent-ure*, dis-a-vent-ure*, s. [Pref. dis, and Eng. adventure (q. v.); O. Fr. désaventure.] A misfortune, a misadventure, a mishap.

"Experience hath oft proved, that such as esteem themselves most secure, even then fall soonest into disadventure." —Raleigh: Arts of Empire, p. 176.

dis-ad-vent-ū-rous, dis-a-vent-rous*, a. [Pref. dis, and Eng. adventurous (q. v.).] Unfortunate, unhappy.

"There unto him betid a disadventurous case." —Spenser: F. Q., IV. xii. 4.

dis-ad-vi-se*, v. t. [Pref. dis, and Eng. advise (q. v.).] To advise not to do anything; to dissuade from doing anything.

"I had a clear reason to disadvise the purchase of it." —Boyle: Works, v. 464.

dis-af-fect*, v. t. [Pref. dis, and Eng. affect (q. v.).]

1. To fill with discontent; to alienate the good will of; to make discontented or disaffected; to estrange.

"They had attempted to disaffect and discontent his majesty's late army." —Clarendon: Civil War.

2. To disturb, to disorder.

"It disaffects the bowels, entangles and distorts the entrails." —Hammond: Serm., xxiii.

3. To dislike; to be without a liking or esteem for; to shun; to avoid.

"That truth which my charity persuades me the most part of them disaffect." —Chillingworth: Religion of Protestants (Dedic.).

dis-af-fect-ēd, a. [Pref. dis, and Eng. affected.]

1. Discontented; alienated in spirit; estranged; unfriendly.

"He had frequently talked of the havoc which was making among his disaffected subjects." —Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

2. Disturbed, disordered, in disorder.

"As if a man should be dissected
To find what part is disaffected."

Butler: Hudibras, pt. ii., c. 1.

*3. Disliked, unwished for, undesired.

"To cast her against her mind upon a disaffected match." —By. Hall: Cases of Conscience.

dis-af-fect-ēd-ly, adv. [Eng. disaffected; -ly.] In a disaffected, discontented, or estranged manner.

dis-af-fect-ēd-ness*, s. [English disaffected; -ness.] The quality or state of being disaffected; disaffection.

"The treachery and disaffectedness of the rest." —Strype: Memorials (an. 1632).

dis-af-fect-ing*, pr. par., a. & s. [DISAFFECT.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of making disaffected; the state of becoming or being disaffected; disaffection.

dis-af-fec-tion, s. [Pref. dis, and Eng. affection (q. v.).]

*1. A state or feeling of dislike or ill-will.

"In making laws, princes must have regard to the public dispositions, to the affections and disaffections, of the people." —Taylor: Rule of Holy Living.

*2. A want or loss of affection.

"This daughter that was so unjustly suspected of disaffection." —Adventurer, No. 122.

3. Discontent, estrangement, or alienation of the affections, especially toward those in authority; disloyalty.

"In this age, everything disliked by those who think with the majority is called disaffection." —Swift.

*4. In a physical sense, disorder or derangement of any part; bad constitution.

"The disease took its original merely from the disaffection of the part, and not from the peccancy of the humors." —Wiseman.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between disaffection and disloyalty: "Men are disaffected to the government; disloyal to their prince. Disaffection may be said with regard to any form of government; disloyalty only with regard to a monarchy. Although both terms are commonly employed in a bad sense, yet the former does not always convey the unfavorable meaning which is attached to the latter. A man may have reasons to think himself justified in disaffection; but he will never attempt to offer anything in justification of disloyalty. A usurped government will have many disaffected subjects with whom it must deal leniently; the best king may have disloyal subjects, upon whom he must exercise the rigors of the law. Many were disaffected to the usurpation of Oliver Cromwell, because they could not be disloyal to their king." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dis-af-fec-tion-ate*, a. [Pref. dis, and Eng. affectionate (q. v.).]

1. Without affection; not affectionate.

"He had been tormented by a beautiful but disaffectionate and disobedient wife." —Hayley: Life of Milton.

2. Disaffected, unfriendly, not well-disposed.

"They, according to that climate, were found disaffectionate to the Turkish affairs." —Blount: Voyage into the Levant (1660), p. 99.

dis-af-firm*, dis-af-fyrme*, v. t. [Pref. dis, and Eng. affirm (q. v.).]

1. Ord. Lang.: To deny, to contradict.

"Neither doth Glanvil or Bracton disaffirm the antiquity of the reports of the law." —Davies: Preface to Reports.

2. Law: Not to confirm; to annul, to reverse, as the decision of a lower court.

dis-af-firm-ance*, s. [Pref. dis, and Eng. affirmance (q. v.).]

1. Ord. Lang.: The act of denying or contradicting; negation, refutation.

"That kind of reasoning which reduceth the opposite conclusion to something that is apparently absurd, is a demonstration in disaffirmance of anything that is affirmed." —Hale.

2. Law: The annulling or reversing of a decision of a lower court.

dis-af-firm-ed*, pa. par. or a. [DISAFFIRM.]

dis-āg-grēg-āt-ing*, pr. par., a. & s. [DISAGGREGATE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The same as DISAGGREGATION (q. v.).

dis-āg-grēg-ā-tion*, s. [Pref. dis, and Eng. aggregation (q. v.).] The act or process of separating an aggregate mass into its component parts.

dis-a-grēe, v. i. [Prefix. dis, and Eng. agree (q. v.).]

1. Not to agree, to differ, to be different or unlike.

"The mind clearly and infallibly perceives all distinct ideas to disagree; that is, the one not to be the other." —Locke.

2. To differ in opinion or views; to hold opposite or contrary views.

"Who shall decide when doctors disagree?" —Pope: Moral Essays, iii. 1.

3. To quarrel, to fall out.

"But where will fierce contention end,
If flowers can disagree?" —Cowper: The Lily and the Rose.

¶ To disagree with:

(1) To be of a different opinion; to differ in opinion or views; not to harmonize or agree.

"They reject the plainest sense of Scripture, because it seems to disagree with what they call reason." —Atterbury.

(2) To be unsuitable or improper for.

(3) To result in discomfort as a consequence of contact or use; as, diet or location may disagree with one's health or well being.

¶ For the difference between to disagree and to differ, see DIFFER.

dis-a-grēe-a-ble, a. [Pref. dis, and Eng. agreeable (q. v.).] Disagreeableness, unpleasantness.

"The depression of countenance which some immediately disagreeability had brought on." —Madame D'Arbly: Diary, iii. 334. (Davies.)

dis-a-grēe-a-ble, a. & s. [Pref. dis, and Eng. agreeable (q. v.); Fr. désagréable.]

A. As adjective:

1. Not in agreement or accord; discordant, discrepant.

"Teach nothing that is disagreeable thereunto." —Udall: Mark iv.

2. Offensive, unpleasant, repugnant to the feelings or senses.

"I will not persist in reading what is so disagreeable." —Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

The most common form is that of a fleshy ring, either entire or variously lobed, surrounding the base of the ovary, as in Lamium, Orobanch, &c. Sometimes it is a cup, as in Pæonia; sometimes it is reduced to a few scales, as may be seen in various plants with an inferior ovary. (Lindley, &c.)

(b) Spec.: A fleshy solid body interposed between the top of the ovary and the base of the style in the Composite. In this great order, or series of orders, the inflorescence is suggestive of the sun surrounded by rays. In a daisy the florets of the disk are the yellow tubular ones, the florets of the ray are the ring of ligulate (strap-shaped) white or pink-tipped florets surrounding those first mentioned.

(2) Of flowerless plants:

(a) The receptacle of some fungals.

(b) The Chymenium of certain other fungals.

3. Mach.: One of the collars separating and fastening the cutters on a horizontal mandrel.

B. As adjective: (See the compounds.)

disc-coupling, disk-coupling, s.

Mach.: A kind of coupling composed of two discs keyed on the connected end of the two shafts. One of the two discs has in it two recesses into which corresponding projections on the other disc are fitted, thus locking the two discs together.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, gell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f.

disk steam-engine, s. A form of rotary steam-engine which was invented by Ericsson and improved by Bishopp and others. In the Ericsson engine the disk revolves, and in the Bishopp engine the disk oscillates.

disc-telegraph, disk-telegraph, s.

Teleg.: One in which the letters and figures are arranged around a circular plate and are brought consecutively into an opening, or otherwise specifically indicated. The first of this class of telegraphic apparatus seems to have been that of Ronald made in 1816. At each end of the line were clocks beating in unison; at least, such was the requirement of the invention. Each clock-work rotated a disk having the letters and numerals on a circular track, and these were exposed in consecutive order at an opening in the dial, the two ends of the line showing the same letter coincidentally. The sender of a message watched till the required letter came in view, then made an electric connection, which diverged a pair of pith balls and drew attention to the letter. This was repeated for each letter, the parties waiting till the required letter came in its turn to the openings in the respective dials. (Knight.) disc-valve, disk-valve, s.

Mach.: A valve formed by a perforated disk which has a rotation, partial and reciprocating, or complete, upon a circular seat whose apertures form ports for steam or other fluid.

disc-wheel, disk-wheel, s.

Mach.: A wheel which differs from the usual worm-wheel in the mode of presenting the spiral to the cog-wheel. The spiral thread on the face of the disk drives the spur-gear, moving it the distance of one tooth at each revolution. The shafts are at right angles to each other. (Knight.)

Disk-wheel.

dis-cāg-ed, a. [Pref. dis, and Eng. caged (q. v.).] Un-

"The hemorrhage being stopped, the next occurrence is a thin serous discharge."—Sharp: Surgery.

7. Elect.: Restoration to the neutral state. Used of a condenser. The discharge may be either slow or instantaneous.

¶ Discharge of fluids.: That branch of hydraulics which treats of the emission or vent of fluids through apertures.

discharge-style, s.

Calico-printing.:

1. A mode of calico-printing in which thickened acidulous matter, either pure or mixed with mordants, is imprinted in certain points upon the cloth, which is afterward padded with a dark-colored mordant, and then dyed, with the effect of showing bright figures on a darkish ground. Also known as the Rongean-style.

2. A mode in which certain portions of color are removed from dyed goods by the topical application of chlorine or chromic acid. [DECOLORING-STYLE; BANDANNA.] discharge-valve, s. In marine engines, a valve covering the top of the air-pump, opening when pressed from beneath.

dis-charged, pa. par. or a. [DISCHARGE, v.]

dis-charg'-ér, s. [Eng. discharge(e); -er.]

I. Ord. Lang.: One who discharges, in any of the senses of the verb.

"Deth is the discharger of all griefes and myseries."—Sir T. Elyot: Castel of Helth, ch. xii.

II. Technically:

1. Calico-printing.: A material with which cloth is printed, in order that the color in which the cloth is subsequently dipped may be removed from those portions printed with the discharger. The discharger acts either upon the coloring-matter or on the mordant before the cloth is exposed to the dye. It acts chemically by converting the coloring-matter into colorless or soluble products; or upon the mordant by removing its effectiveness in setting the color. It differs from a resist, which is an application to prevent a color taking upon a cloth. A discharger is to remove it.

2. Elect.: [DISCHARGING-ROD.]

dis-charg'-lâg, pr. par., a. & s. [DISCHARGE, v.]
A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of unloading, emitting, paying, satisfying, dismissing, or releasing; discharge.

"Accompanied with the drawing of swords, discharging of pistols."—State Trials: Case of Don Pantaleon Sa (an. 1654).

discharging-arch, s.

Arch.: An arch formed in the substance of a wall, to relieve the part which is below it from the superincumbent weight or pressure; it is frequently used over lintels and flat-headed openings. The chords of discharging arches are not much longer than the lintel, being the segments of very large circles. A temporary arch is frequently introduced, and removed on completing the building. Sometimes the arches are built without any lintel under them. (Weale, &c.) discharging-rod, s.

Elect.: An instrument to discharge a charged electrical jar or battery. It has a glass handle and a pair of hinged rods with balls on the ends, which are brought into connection respectively with the two surfaces or poles of the jar or battery.

dis-châr'-l-tÿ, s.* [Prof. dis. and Eng. charity (q. v.).] A want of charity.

"When devotion to the Creator should cease to be testified by discharity toward his creatures."—Brougham.

dis-child'-l-a, s. [Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and schidon=a splinter; schizô=to divide.]

Bot.: Pitcher-plants. A genus of plants belonging to the order Asclepiadaceae. They are shrubs or herbs, natives of India and Australia. Dischidia Rafflesiana, a creeping plant with a long twining stem, is destitute of leaves until near the summit, and as this may be two feet or more from the roots, it can hardly depend on them for nourishment by absorption of fluid from the ground. It is therefore provided with a means for storing up the moisture which it from time to time collects. The pitcher appears formed of a leaf, with the edges rolled toward each other and adherent; the upper end, or mouth, is open to receive whatever moisture may descend from the air. The plant has also a tuft of absorbent fibers resembling those of the roots, which are prolonged from the nearest part of the branch, or even from the stalk to which the pitcher is attached, and spread through the cavity. They introduce into the plant the nourishment collected in the pitchers.

dis-gî-de, v. t.* [Lat. discindo, perf. t. discidi; dis=away, apart, and scindo=to cut.] [DISCIND.]
To cut asunder, to divide, to cleave in two.

2. To separate, to part.

"Those golden links that do enchain Whole nations, though discind by the main."
Howell: Letters (To the Reader).

dis-gîn'-l-dæ, s. pl.* [Mod. Lat. discin(a), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Palæont.: A family of Mollusca, belonging to the order Brachiopoda, in which the animal is attached by means of a muscular peduncle passing through the ventral or lower valve, by means of a slit in its hinder portion, or a circular foramen excavated in its substance; arms fleshy; valves not articulated. They range from the Silurian period to the present day. Three genera are known.

dis-gîn-ôc'-ar-is, s. [Greek diskos=a disc. and kara=a head.]

Palæont.: A genus of Crustacea, belonging to the order Phyllopoda. They are found in the Lower Silurian. The carapace is rounded, with concentric lines of growth, a wedge-shaped indentation in front caused by the separation of the anterior portion of the head from the carapace.

*dis-gî'-ple, *de-ci-pele, *de-ci-ple, *de-cy-ple, *des-ci-ple, *di-ci-ple, dys-cy-pyl, s. [Fr. disciple; Prov. disciple, discipol; Sp. & Port. discipulo; Ital. discepolo, from Lat. discipulus=a learner, a pupil, from disco=to learn.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A pupil of any teacher or philosopher; a scholar, a learner; one who attends on another in order to receive instruction from him.

"A young disciple should behave himself so well as to gain the affection and the ear of his instructor."—Watts.

2. One who follows the teaching, examples, or precepts of another.

"Seeming to be only the minister of his disciple's pleasures."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xx.

II. Religious:

1. Generally:

(1) One who, whether adult or of immature age, has such veneration for a particular religious teacher as to be willing to become his scholar. In this sense John the Baptist had disciples (Matt. ix. 14).

(2) One who stands in a similar relation not to an individual teacher, but to a sect, party, or school of religious thought. In this sense the Pharisees had disciples (Matt. xxii. 15, 16).

2. Spec. (in a Christian sense):

(1) Originally: One of the twelve Apostles (Matt. x. 1; xi. 1; xx. 17; Luke ix. 1).

(2) Subsequently: A professed believer in Christ; a member of the Christian Church (Acts i. 15).

¶ Disciples of Christ:

Ch. Hist.: The name assumed by a religious sect, otherwise known as Campbellites, Reformers, or Reformed Baptists. It took its rise from the zealous efforts of Rev. Alexander Campbell, an Irish Presbyterian minister, to bring about a union of all Christians in one fold, the fundamental point being that the Bible alone should be taken as the authorized bond of union and the infallible rule of faith and practice. His first congregation was organized in Pennsylvania in September, 1810. The Disciples of Christ hold the doctrine of adult baptism, but in many points differ from the Baptists.

¶ For the difference between disciple and scholar, see SCHOLAR.

dis-gî'-ple, v. t.* [DISCIPLE, s.]

1. To train, to bring up, to teach.

"He did look far
Into the service of the time, and was Disciple of the bravest."
Shakespeare: All's Well, i. 2.

2. To discipline, to punish.

"That better were in virtues discipled,
Then with vain pompes feeds to have their fancy led."
Spenser: F. Q., IV. i. (Introd. i.)

¶ In this sense pronounced dis'-ci-ple, whence the form disple (q. v.).

3. To make disciples of; to convert.

"Preaching to or discipling all nations."—Hammond: Works, vol. ii., pt. iv., p. 112.

dis-ci-pline, dis-ce-pline, dis-si-pline, dis-si-pline, s. [Fr. discipline; Sp., Port., & Ital. disciplina; Lat. disciplina, from discipulus=a disciple; disco=to learn.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act or art of teaching, instructing, and training the mind and manners; education, training.

"Under her moders discipline, a clone maide."—Gower, ii. 354.

2. That which is taught; an art, a science, a branch of knowledge.

"Art may be said to overcome and advance nature in these mechanical disciplines."—Wilkins.

3. The rule, order, or method of government; the method or rules for maintaining order and regularity. [II. 2.]

"Obey the rules and discipline of art."—Dryden: Virgil; Georgic ii. 74.

4. The act or practice of correcting, chastening, or training by means of punishments or castigation. [II. 1.]

"A lively cobbler kicked and spurred while his wife was carrying him, and had scarce passed a day without giving her the discipline of the strap."—Addison: Spectator.

5. A state of correction, chastisement, or training by the medium of punishment, suffering, or adversity; chastening.

"The sharpest discipline of adversity had taught him nothing."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xii.

6. A state of being under subjection or perfect command.

"The most perfect, who have their passions in the best discipline, are yet obliged to be constantly on their guard."—Rogers.

7. An instrument of penance for self-chastisement, usually made of small cords.

"Not content with a common sort of discipline, she made one for herself of two iron chains."—F. W. Faber: Saints and Servants of God; Rose of Lima, ch. v.

II. Technically:

1. Ecclesiast., Ch. Hist., & Law: Action partly of a penal, partly of a reformatory nature, directed against one who has offended against morality or church law. A certain spiritual power distinct from the secular authority of the civil magistrate was given to St. Peter, who, till St. Paul came upon the scene, was the most prominent member of the Apostolic college, and had been the first to answer the question put by Jesus, "But whom say ye that I am?" (Matt. xvi. 15-19.) From being symbolized by "the keys of the kingdom of heaven," it has sometimes been called the power of the keys (verse 19). This authority was not limited to St. Peter, it was soon afterward given to all the apostles (Matt. xviii. 17, 18). A notable case of immorality occurring in the Corinthian Church, St. Paul directed that discipline should be executed against the offender, who was to be delivered to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved "in the day of the Lord Jesus." (1 Cor. v.) The excommunicated offender keenly felt his position, became repentant, and, by direction of the Apostle, was restored to the church (2 Cor. ii. 6-8). Discipline existed in the church in early and mediæval times. At the beginning of Lent those convicted of notorious sins were put to open penance in the world for their spiritual benefit, and as a warning to others. When the Papacy was at its height, excommunication was a weapon so formidable that even powerful kings quailed at the thought that it might be directed against them. It still continues in the Church of Rome, but is now capable of exciting little terror. In the Church of England it has given place to the Communion Service on Ash Wednesday, the compilers of the Liturgy considering the arrangement only temporary "until the said discipline may be restored again, which is much to be wished." The Church of Scotland exercises discipline on those inside its pale, though some of the judicial decisions which produced the Disruption and were approved of by the government of the time showed that if those who administered discipline were held to have exceeded their powers, damages would lie against them for any injury done to the reputation of an individual. [DISRUPTION.] Discipline is exercised also in the various other Churches, but caution requires to be exercised. If the disciplinary authorities break the rules of their denomination in condemning an alleged delinquent, damages will lie against them, if the matter be carried to a civil court; the same effect will follow if malice be shown. Nor is it safe for the adherent of one denomination to complain to the authorities of another, that some one under them has acted flagrantly amiss. Judicial decisions have been given to the effect that one has no interest in keeping pure the communion roll of any denomination but his own, and must not therefore be a complainant in a case like that now supposed.

2. Milit., &c.: The rules and regulations by which a body of men are kept in a state of efficiency and order, and under complete command; the state of being under complete command.

"The general could find among them no remains either of martial discipline or of martial spirit."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

¶ (1) Discipline of the Secret: (See extract.)

"To veil the sacred mysteries from the gaze of vulgar ignorance and gentle profanation, the Discipline of the Secret enacted that the faithful should conceal the Creed, the Sacraments, and the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass from all knowledge of the uninitiated; and priests were directed to convey the substance and formularies of the liturgy by word of mouth to one another, and were prohibited from committing them to writing."—Rock: Hierurgia, p. 161. (Note.)

(2) To take the discipline: To chastise one's self with a discipline, as an act of penance for one's own offenses, or in satisfaction for the sins of others.

"To appease the anger of God she took the discipline so severely that she was nearly dying in consequence."—F. W. Faber: Saints and Servants of God; Rose of Lima, ch. v.

¶ For the difference between discipline and correction, see CORRECTION.

2. Equity: To disclaim all right or title to the matter in dispute.

"To make the proper person a party, instead of the defendant disclaiming."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iii., ch. 18.

3. Patent Law: To disclaim all claim to patent rights or title to any part of an invention.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to disclaim and to disown: "Disclaim and disown are both personal acts respecting the individual who is the agent; to disclaim is to throw off a claim, as to disown is not to admit as one's own; as claim, from the Latin clamo, signifies to declare with a loud tone what we want as our own; so to disclaim is, with an equally loud or positive tone, to give up a claim; this is a more positive act than to disown, which may be performed by insinuation, or by the mere abstaining to own." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

*dis-clām-ā-tion, s. [DISCLAIMATION.]

dis-clā-imed, pa. par. or a. [DISCLAIM.]

dis-cord, des-cord, dis-corde, dys-corde, s. [O. Fr. descord; Fr. discord; Sp. Port. & Ital. discordia, from Lat. discordia, from discors = discordant: dis = away, apart, and cor (genit. cordis) = the heart.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Want of concord or agreement; dissension, disagreement, contention, strife, antagonism.

"Though concord is in itself better than discord, discord may indicate a better state of things."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. viii.

2. Disagreement or contention personified.

"Discord, dire sister of the slaughtering power."

Pope: Homer's Iliad, iv. 502.

3. A disagreement or opposition in quality, especially in sounds. [II. 1.]

"Take but degree away, untune that string,

And hark what discord follows."

Shakesp.: Troilus and Cressida, i. 3.

II. Technically:

1. Mus.: A discord is a combination of notes which produces a certain restless craving in the mind for some further combination upon which it can rest with satisfaction. Discords comprise such chords as contain notes which are next to each other in alphabetical order, and such as have augmented or diminished intervals, with the exception in the latter case of the chord of the sixth and third on the second note of any key. The changed combination which must follow them, in order to relieve the sense of pain they produce, is called the resolution. [HARMONY, RESOLUTION.] (C. H. H. Parry, in Grove's Musical Dict.)

2. Fine Arts: A term applied to paintings when there is a disagreement of the parts or coloring; when the objects appear foreign to each other, and have an unpleasant and unnatural effect. (Weale.)

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between discord and strife: "Where there is strife there must be discord, but there may be discord without strife: discord consists most in the feeling; strife consists most in the outward action. Discord evinces itself in various ways: by looks, words, or actions; strife displays itself in words or acts of violence. Discord is fatal to the happiness of families; strife is the greatest enemy to peace between neighbors. Discord arose between the goddesses on the apple being thrown into the assembly; Homer commences his poem with the strife that took place between Agamemnon and Achilles. Discord may arise from mere difference of opinion; strife is in general occasioned by some matter of personal interest: discord in the councils of a nation is the almost certain forerunner of its ruin; the common principles of politeness forbid strife among persons of good breeding." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between discord and dis-sension, see DISSENSION.

dis-cord, des-cord-en, dis-cord-en, dys-cord-yn, v. t. [Fr. discorder; O. Fr. descorder; Prov. descordar; Sp. & Port. discordar; Ital. discordare, from Lat. discordo, from discors = discordant.]

1. To disagree, to differ; not to be in concord or agreement.

"The Scottis and the Pictes discordeth in maneres."—Trevisa, v. 229.

2. To make a discord, to jar, to be discordant.

"Sounds do disturb and alter the one the other; sometimes the one drowning the other, and making it not heard; sometimes the one jarring and discording with the other, and making a confusion."—Bacon.

"Discordyn yn sownde or syngynge. Dissono, deltro."—Frompt. Parv.

dis-cord-a-ble, a. [O. Fr. descordable; Lat. discordabilis.] Discordant, disagreeing, not in concord.

Robert of Gloucester, p. 255.

dis-cord-ôus, a. [Eng. discord; -ous.] Discordant, quarrelsome, disagreeing.

"Men grew greedie, discordous, and nice."

Hall: Satires, bk. iii., sat. 1.

dis-cor-pôr-âte, a. [Pref. dis, and Eng. corporate (q. v.).]

1. Disembodied.

"The discorporate selfish."—Carlyle: Miscellanies, iii. 198.

2. Deprived of the privileges or status of a corporation.

dis-côr-rës-pônd-ënt, a. [Pref. dis, and Eng. correspondent, a. (q. v.).] Not correspondent or agreeing; unsuited, unfitted.

"It would be discordant in respect of God."—Montagu: Devout Essays, pt. ii., tr. vii., § 3.

†dis-côs-tâte, a. [Lat. dis = away, apart, and costatus = ribbed; costa = a side, a rib.]

Bot.: A term applied to leaves in which the ribs diverge or proceed in a radiating manner, as in the sycamore, vine, and geranium. (Balfour.)

dis-côun-sël, v. t. [Pref. dis, and Eng. counsel (q. v.).] To dissuade, to dissuade.

"But him the palmer from that vanity

With temperate advice discountelled."

Spenser: F. Q., II. xii. 34.

dis-côunt, dis-compt, s. [O. Fr. descompte; Fr. décompte; Port. desconto; Sp. descuento, from Low Lat. discomputus; Lat. dis = away, apart, and computus = a reckoning.]

I. Ord. Lang.: In the same sense as II.

"They were glad to find some usurer who would purchase their tickets at forty per cent discount."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iii.

II. Technically:

1. Comm.: A deduction made in the payment of a bill or settlement of an account for ready or prompt payment; a sum deducted at a certain rate per cent from the credit price of any article in consideration of prompt payment. Thus, if the credit price of an article be (say) $25, the seller will deduct from his charge a certain percentage (say ten per cent) for ready money, so that the amount payable by the buyer will be reduced to $22.50. The term discount is applied both to the amount deducted and the rate per cent at which the deduction is calculated or allowed.

2. Banking:

(1) A charge made at a certain rate per cent for the interest of money advanced on a bill or other document due at some future time. This charge the discountor of the bill, &c., deducts from the amount of the bill, handing over the balance to the borrower; a deduction from the present value of a security, the payment of which is postponed. The rate of discount depends on, and is regulated by, the market value of money.

"As the market tightens, the rate of discount rises."—Rogers: Political Economy, p. 147.

(2) The act of discounting a bill or other document.

¶ At a discount:

(1) Lit.: Below par; depreciated below the nominal value.

(2) Fig.: Out of favor or esteem; unappreciated.

dis-côunt, dis-compt, v. t. & i. [O. Fr. descompter; Fr. décompter; Sp. & Port. descontar; Ital. scontare, from Low Lat. discomputo; Lat. dis = away, apart, and computo = to reckon, to compute (q. v.).]

A. Transitive:I. Ordinary Language:*1. Literally:

(1) To omit in counting; to leave out of an account.

(2) In the same sense as II.

2. Figuratively:

* (1) To deduct from anything due or earned.

"An unthrifty anticipation in this our minority, to be discounted to us out of our future state of loving."—Mountagu: Devout Essays, pt. i., tr. xiv, § 3.

* (2) To leave out of account, to disregard, to ignore.

"His application is to be discounted, as here irrelevant."—Sir W. Hamilton.

(3) To take into consideration or estimate beforehand; to anticipate and expect. Thus to discount news or intelligence is to anticipate or look for such news, and then act as though it were already known for certain.

"Every change in that series of events would be discounted and speculated about on every Stock Exchange in England, and perhaps in the world."—British Quarterly Review, vol. lvii. (1873), p. 386.

* (4) To pay back, to make amends or atonement.

"My prayers and penance shall discount for these."—Dryden: Don Sebastian, iii. 1.

II. Technically:

1. Comm.: To deduct or allow a certain sum from a bill or account due, for ready money.

2. Banking: To lend or advance the amount of a bill or other document due at some future date, deducting the interest at a certain rate per cent. from the principal: it is really to buy from the holder of a bill, note, &c., the right to receive the money due upon it.

"No great increase can be suddenly made in the amount of capital available for discounting bills."—Rogers: Political Economy, p. 147.

B. Intrans.: To lend or advance money on bills and other documents, due at some future date, deducting the interest at the time of making the advance.

dis-cov-ér, des-chuv-er, dis-cure, dis-kev-er, dis-kov-er, dys-cur-in, v. t. & i. [Old Fr. descouvrir, descuvrir; Fr. découvrir; Sp. & Port. descubrir; Ital. discoprire, scoprire; Low Lat. discooperio=to uncover: dis=away, apart, and cooprio=to cover.]

A. Transitive:

1. Ordinary Language:

I. Literally:

(1) To uncover, to remove a cover from.

"The cover of the coach was made with such joints, that they might put each end down, and remain as discovered and open-sighted as on horseback."—Sidney: Arcadia.

(2) To lay open or expose to view, to cause to become visible.

"Go draw aside the curtains and discover"

The several caskets to this noble prince."

Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, ii. 7.

(3) To reveal, to disclose, to make known.

"Darkness visible"

Served only to discover sights of woe."

Milton: P. L., i. 63, 64.

(4) To cause anything to cease to be a covering, to strip.

"The voice of the Lord maketh the hinds to calve, and discovereth the forests."—Psalm xxi. 9.

(5) To detect in concealment.

"Up he starts"

Discovered and surprised."

Milton: P. L., iv. 813, 814.

Many great regions are discovered."

Spenser: F. Q., II. (Introd. 2).

(7) To be the first to find out and make known anything; to invent.

(8) To find, to detect.

"The Jacobites, however, discovered in the events of the campaign abundant matter for invective."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

II. Law: To make a discovery or disclosure of any matter in answer to a bill in Chancery.

B. Intransitive:

I. Lit.: To uncover, to unmask.

"This done, they discover."—Decker: Whore of Babylon (1607).

II. Figuratively:

1. To reveal, to disclose.

"That you have discovered thus."

Shakespeare: Much Ado, ii. 2.

2. To espy, to spy out.

"Thou hast painfully discovered."

Shakespeare: Timon, v. 2.

3. To find out.

(1) Crabb thus discriminates between discover, to manifest, and to declare: "The idea of making known is conveyed by all these terms; but discover expresses less than manifest, and that than declare: we discover by indirect means or signs more or less doubtful; we manifest by unquestionable marks; we declare by express words: talents and dispositions discover themselves; particular feelings and sentiments manifest themselves; facts, opinions, and sentiments are declared: children early discover a turn for some particular art or science; a person manifests his regard for another by unequivocal proofs of kindness; a person of an open disposition is apt to declare his sentiments without disguise. Things are said to discover, persons only manifest or declare in the proper sense; but they may be used figuratively: it is the nature of everything subliminal to discover symptoms of decay more or less early; it is particularly painful when any one manifests an unfriendly disposition from whom he had reason to expect the contrary." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

(2) For the difference between to discover and to detect, see DETECT; for that between to discover and to find, see FIND; and for that between to discover and to uncover, see UNCOVER.

(3) Blair thus accurately discriminates between the words to discover and to invent: "We invent things that are new; we discover what was before hidden. Galileo invented the telescope; Harvey discovered the circulation of the blood."

dis-cov-ér-a-ble, a. [Eng. discover; -able.]

dis-crā-se, dis-crās-ite, dys-crās-ite, s. [Gr. dys, in comp.=bad, and krasis=a mixture. (Dana).] According to others, from Gr. dis=twice, twofold, and krasis=a mixture, in allusion to its composition.]

Min.: An orthorhombic, opaque, massive mineral with a metallic luster; color and streak silver-white, inclining to tin-white, sometimes tarnished yellow or blackish. Composition: Antimony, 22; silver, 78=100; hardness, 3½-4; specific gravity-bōl, bōy; pōūt, jōwī; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph=f. -cian, -tian=shān. -tion, -sion=shūn; -tion, -sion=zhūn. -tious, -cious, -sious=shūs. -ble, -dle, &c.=bēl, dēl-

944-952. It is a valuable and very rare ore of silver, occurring in hexagonal prisms, in Germany, Spain, and Bolivia, associated with other ores of silver, native arsenic and galena, and other species. Also called Antimonide of Silver, Antimonial Silver, &c.

dis-crā se, v. t. [Gr. dyskrasia=a bad temperament; dys=bad, and krasis=a mixture.] To distemper, to disorder in temperament.

"So they, when God hath bestowed their bodies upon them, as gorgeous palaces or mansion houses wherein the mind may dwell with pleasure and delight, do first, by this evil demeanour, shake and discrase them, and then being altogether careless of repairing them, do suffer them to run to destruction."—Barrough: Method of Physic, 1624. (Nares.)

dis-crā ged, dis-craysed, a. [DISCRASE, v.] In a distempered condition; disordered in temperament.

"Discraysed. Egrotus, Male habens, Valetudinarius."—Huloet.

dis-crēd-īt, s. [Pref. dis, and Eng. credit (q. v.).] 1. A want or loss of credit or reputation; disesteem; a slight degree of disgrace.

"Came out of the conflict without discredit."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

2. A want of trust, belief, or confidence.

3. Anything which causes a loss of credit or reputation.

"It would not have relished among my other discred-its."—Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, v. 2.

dis-crēd-īt, v. t. [Prefix dis, and Eng. credit (q. v.); Fr. décriditer.] 1. Not to credit or believe; to have no faith or belief in; to disbelieve.

"Livy, however, discredits this account and thinks that the Apulians themselves were attacked."—Lewis: Cred. Early Rom. Hist. (1855), ch. xiii., pt. ii., § 31.

*2. To deprive of credibility; to make not trusted.

"To stand so much upon the discrediting of witnesses."—State Trials: Duke of Norfolk (1571).

3. To bring into discredit; to bring reproach or shame upon; to disgrace.

"O, sir, you had then left unseen a wonderful piece of work; which not to have been blessed withal, would have discredited your travel."—Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, i. 2.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between discredit, disgrace, reproach, and scandal: "Discredit signifies the loss of credit; disgrace, the loss of grace, favor, or esteem; reproach stands for the thing that deserves to be reproached; and scandal for the thing that gives scandal or offense. The conduct of men in their various relations with each other may give rise to the unfavorable sentiment which is expressed in common by these terms. Things are said to reflect discredit or disgrace, to bring reproach or scandal, on the individual. These terms seem to rise in sense one upon the other: disgrace is a stronger term than discredit; reproach than disgrace; and scandal than reproach. Discredit interferes with a man's credit or respectability; disgrace marks him out as an object of unfavorable distinction; reproach makes him the subject of reproachful conversation; scandal makes him an object of offense or even abhorrence. . . . Discredit depends much on the character, circumstances, and situation of those who discredit and those who are discredited. . . . disgrace depends on the temper of men's minds as well as collateral circumstances: where a nice sense of moral propriety is prevalent in any community, disgrace inevitably attaches to a deviation from good morals. Reproach and scandal refer more immediately to the nature of the actions than to the character of the persons." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dis-crēd-īt-a-ble, a. [Pref. dis, and Eng. creditable (q. v.).] Tending to bring discredit, shame or disgrace upon anybody or upon anything; not creditable; disreputable, disgraceful.

"Providence gives us notice, by sensible declensions, that we may disengage from the world by degrees."—Collier: On Thought.

"Crabb thus discriminates between to disengage, to disentangle, and to extricate. "Extricate, in Latin extricatus, from ex and trica, a hair, or noose, signifies to get as it were out of a noose. As to engage signifies simply to bind, and entangle signifies to bind in an involved manner, to disentangle is naturally applied to matters of greater difficulty and perplexity than to disengage. As for the term extricate includes the idea of that which would hold fast and keep within a tight involvement, it is employed with respect to matters of the greatest possible embarrassment and intricacy: we may be disengaged from an oath, disentangled from pecuniary difficulties, extricated from a suit at law; it is not right to expect to be disengaged from all the duties which attach to men as members of society; he who enters into disputes about contested property must not expect to be soon disentangled from the law; when a general has committed himself by coming into too close a contact with a very superior force, he may think himself fortunate if he can extricate himself from his awkward situation with the loss of half his army." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

2. Vehicles: The projection outwardly of the tire beyond the plane of the insertion of the spokes in the hub. This is not necessary when the spindle of the axle is cylindrical, but when the spindle is tapering, it is necessary to give a gather and swing to the spindle, and a dish to the wheel. The gather is the setting forward of the end of the spindle so that the wheel may run freely, not pressing inordinately either on the nut or the butting-ring. The swing is the setting downward of the end of the spindle so that its lower edge may be horizontal. The load resting thus, the wheel has no special tendency to slip in or out against the butting-ring or the nut. The swing tips the wheel outward at top, inclining it away from the wagon, and, to enable the bearing on the spokes, fellys, and tire to be vertical, the wheel is dished, so that each spoke is vertical as it comes to the lower or working position. The fellys being set square on the spokes, the tread of the wheel is flat on the ground. (Knight.)

B. As adj.: (See the compounds.)

¶ To lay in one's dish: To lay to one's charge.

"The manifold examples that commonly are alleged, to deter men from finishing such works as have bene left unperfect by notable artificers in all sciences, could not make me afraide; howbeit perchance they may be told in my dish."—Phaer: Virgil (1600).

dis-hōn-ēst (h mute), a. [O. Fr. deshonneste; Fr. deshonnête: des=Lat. dis=away, apart, and honneste, Fr. honnête=Lat. honestus=honorable; Sp. & Port. deshonesto; Ital. disonesto.] [HONEST.]

*1. Dishonored, disgraceful.

"Lo! his rage dishonest drags along Hector's dead earth, insensible of wrong!"
Pope: Homer's Iliad, xiv. 66, 67.

*2. Disgracing, disgraceful, ignominious, unbe- coming, mean.

"His robe, which spots indelible besmear,
In rags dishonest flutters with the air."
Pope: Homer's Odyssey, xiii. 502, 503.

3. Void or destitute of honesty, probity, or good faith; fraudulent, knavish, cheating, not straight- forward.

"William was too wise not to know the value of an honest man in a dishonest age."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

4. Characterized by dishonesty or want of good faith; fraudulent, not straightforward.

"If they sometimes ascribed to his dishonest policy what was really the effect of accident or inadvantage, the fault was his own."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ix.

5. Acquired or gained dishonestly.

*6. Unchaste, lewd.

"I'll no more of you; besides, you grow dishonest."—Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, i. 6.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between dishonest and knavish: "Dishonest marks the contrary to honest; knavish marks the likeness to a knave. Dishonest characterizes simply the mode of action; knavish characterizes the agent as well as the action: what is dishonest violates the established laws of man; what is knavish supposes peculiar art and design in the accomplishment. It is dishonest to take anything from another which does not be- long to one; it is knavish to get it by fraud or artifice, or by imposing on the confidence of another. We may prevent dishonest practices by ordinary means of security; but we must not trust ourselves in the company of knavish people, if we do not wish to be overreached." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dis-hōn-ēst (h mute), v. t. [O. Fr. deshonester; Sp. & Port. deshonestar; Ital. disonestare, from Lat. deshonesto=to dishonor.]

dis-hōn'-ōr, dis-hon-ōure (h mute), s. [Fr. deshonneur: des=Lat. dis=away, from, and hon-ōur=honor; Sp. deshonor; Ital. disonore.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Disgrace, ignominy; anything which injures the honor or reputation; a reproach, a shame.
"I choose the nobler part, and yield my breath, Rather than bear dishonor, worse than death."
Pope: Homér's Odyssey, xvi. 111, 112.

2. A reproach, or word of disparagement; calumny.

"So good, that no tongue could ever Pronounce dishonor of her."

Shakesp.: Henry VIII., ii. 3.

II. Comm.: Default made in meeting a bill when presented for payment; failure to pay a promissory note when due. [Notice of Dishonor.]

Notice of Dishonor.

Comm.: If, when a bill is presented for acceptance, the person on whom it is drawn refuses to accept it, or if, when presented for payment, the acceptor refuses to pay it, or if a promissory note is not paid when it falls due, such default is termed dishonor; and the holder of the bill or note is bound to give notice to the parties who drew the bill or note, or to those who have negotiated it. This notice is called notice of dishonor or protest, and if the holder fails to give notice of the same, the parties who would otherwise have been responsible are discharged from their liability.

Crabb thus discriminates between dishonor, disgrace, and shame: "Disgrace is more than dishonor and less than shame. The disgrace is applicable to those who are not sensible of the dishonor, and the shame to those who are not sensible of the disgrace. The tender mind is alive to dishonor; those who yield to their passions, or are hardened in their vicious courses, are alike insensible to disgrace or shame. Dishonor is seldom the consequence of any offense, or offered with any intention of punishing; it lies mostly in the consciousness of the individual. Disgrace and shame are the direct consequences of misconduct, but disgrace attaches to the punishment which lowers a person in his own eyes; shame to that which lowers him in the eyes of others: the former is not so degrading nor so exposed to notice as the latter. . . . the fear of dishonor acts as a laudable stimulus to the discharge of one's duty; the fear of disgrace or shame serves to prevent the commission of vices or crimes. A soldier feels it a dishonor not to be always at the post of danger, but he is not always sufficiently alive to the disgrace of being punished, nor is he deterred from his irregularities by the open shame to which he is sometimes put in the presence of his fellow-soldiers. As epithets they likewise rise in sense, and are distinguished by other characteristics: a dishonorable action is that which violates the principles of honor; a disgraceful action is that which reflects disgrace; a shameful action is that of which one ought to be fully ashamed; it is very dishonorable for a man not to keep his word; very disgraceful for a gentleman to associate with those who are his inferiors in station and education; very shameful for him to use his rank and influence over the lower orders only to mislead them from their duty: a person is likewise said to be dishonorable who is disposed to bring dishonor upon himself; but things only are disgraceful or shameful: a dishonorable man renders himself an outcast among his equals; he must then descend to his inferiors, among whom he may become familiar with the disgraceful and the shameful: men of cultivation are alive to what is dishonorable; men of all stations are alive to that which is for them disgraceful, or to that which is in itself shameful: the sense of what is dishonorable is to the superior what the sense of the disgraceful is to the inferior; but the sense of what is shameful is independent of rank or station, and forms a part of that moral sense which is inherent in the breast of every rational creature. Whoever therefore cherishes in himself a lively sense of what is dishonorable or disgraceful is tolerably secure of never committing anything that is shameful." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dis-hōn'-ōr (h mute), s. & v. t. [Fr. deshonorer; O. Sp. deshonorar; Sp. & Port. deshonrar; Ital. disonorare.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To disgrace; to bring disgrace, shame, reproach, or ignominy upon; to stain the character of; to damage the reputation of.

"Dishonor not her honorable name."

Shakesp.: Henry VI., Pt. I., iv. 5.

2. To treat with indignity or ignominy.

dis-in-cūm'-bēred, pa. par. or adj. [DISENCUMBER, v.]

dis-in-cūm'-bēr-ing, pr. par. & adj. [DISENCUMBER, v.]

dis-in-dī-vid'-u-al-ize, v. t. [Pref. dis, and Eng. individualize (q. v.).] To deprive of individuality or character.

"He was answered . . . with a manner not, indeed, wholly disindividualized."—Miss Brontë: Vilette, ch. xxv.

dis-in-fēct, v. t. [Pref. dis, and Eng. infect (q. v.).] To free or cleanse from infection; to cause to be no longer infectious.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rīle, fūll; trȳ, sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

dis-in-fect'-ant, s. [Eng. disinfect; -ant.] A substance which destroys poisonous gases, or decomposes the bodies from which they proceed. It also destroys the specific contagia of disease. Disinfectants differ in their action. Some of the most powerful, as chlorine, chloride of lime, act by uniting with the hydrogen of the offensive body. Others oxidize the gas or vapor; as the fumes of nitric acid when poured on a red-hot brick. Others, by removing water, and coagulating albumen, as carbolic acid, creasote, sulphuric acid, chloride of zinc, corrosive sublimate, &c. Sulphate of iron unites with hydrogen sulphide, forming ferrous sulphide, and liberating sulphuric acid. Sulphur dioxide, easily prepared by burning sulphur, is a powerful disinfectant. It decomposes sulphuretted hydrogen, removes oxygen from organic bodies, and also appears to immediately destroy infections produced from the presence of a fungus. Quicklime absorbs gases from the air, and abstracts water from organic bodies. Finely powdered charcoal is a valuable disinfectant, from its power of absorbing gases. Permanganate of potassium is a powerful oxidizing agent; a solution of it exposed in a wide dish in a sick room absorbs and oxidizes the offensive smell. It is also very useful for disinfecting water for drinking purposes where the supply is bad.

dis-in-fect'-éd, pa. par. or a. [DISINFECT.] dis-in-fect'-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DISINFECT.]
A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)
C. As subst.: The act of purifying from anything infectious.

dis-in-fec'-tion, s. [Pref. dis, and Eng. infection (q. v.).] The act of purifying from infectious or contagious matter, &c.

dis-in-fect'-ör, s. [Eng. disinfect; -ör.] An apparatus for disseminating a gas, vapor, or fine spray for the purification of the air and the counteraction of contagious influences. The modes are various: Atomizers for spraying; vessels in which gases are eliminated by chemical action; vapors generated by the heat of lamps beneath vessels containing the ingredients; blowers by which a medicated atmosphere is diffused; trays in which the materials are exposed to the ordinary currents of air; pastilles for burning; odors and perfumes for disguising; earth and charcoal for absorbing.

dis-in-flä-mé, v. t. [Pref. dis, and Eng. inflammé (q. v.).] To divest or deprive of ardor or enthusiasm.

"Why are your hot spirits so quickly disinflamed?" Chapman: Homer's Iliad, xii.

dis-in-gén-ü'-i-ty, s. [Pref. dis, and Eng. ingenuity (q. v.).] Unfairness; want of candor; disingenuousness.

"They contract a habit of ill-nature and disingenuity necessary to their affairs, and the temper of those upon whom they are to work." Clarendon: Civil War, i. 321.

dis-in-gén-ü-ös, a. [Pref. dis, and Eng. ingenious (q. v.).]

1. (Of persons): Not ingenuous; wanting in frankness, openness, or candor; making use of or given to underhand practices; mean, not straightforward.

"Persons entirely disingenuous, who really do not believe the opinions they defend." Hume: Principles of Morals, § 1.

2. (Of things): Mean, underhand; not open or candid; unbecoming.

"But no artifice could be more disingenuous." Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. i.

dis-in-gén-ü-ös-ly, adv. [Eng. disingenuous; -ly.] In a disingenuous, mean, underhand or unfair manner; not ingenuously, openly, or candidly.

"He disingenuously hints a doubt of it by his words." Seeker: Ans. to Dr. Mayhew's Observations.

dis-in-gén-ü-ös-ness, s. [Eng. disingenuous; -ness.] The quality or state of being disingenuous; a want or absence of frankness, openness, or candor.

"He behaved with a pusillanimity and disingenuousness which deprived him of all claim to respect or pity." Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

dis-in-häb'-it, v. t. [Pref. dis, and Eng. inhabit (q. v.).] [DISINHABIT.] To deprive or clear of inhabitants; to depopulate.

"There were nothing but exceeding rough mountains . . . utterly disinhabited and void of people." Hackluyt: Voyages, iii. 374.

dis-in-hër'-i-sön, s. [DISINHERIT.]

1. The act of disinheriting or cutting off from any hereditary succession.

"To the peril, slander, and disinherison of the king's majesty, and his noble son Prince Edward." State Trials: Earl of Surrey (1546).

2. The state or condition of being disinherited.

"The adultery of the woman is worse, as bringing basely into a family, and disinherisons or great injuries to the lawful children." Jer. Taylor.

dis-in-hër'-it, v. t. [Pref. dis, and Eng. inherit (q. v.).]

1. Lit.: To cut off from an hereditary right; to deprive of an inheritance, or of the right of succeeding as an heir to any property or right which by law or custom would or should devolve on him in the ordinary course of descent.

"Until that act of Parliament be repealed Whereby my son is disinherited." Shakspeare: Henry VI., Pt. III., i. 1.

*2. Fig.: To deprive of possession or right over; to dispossess, to eject.

Stoop thy pale visage through an amber cloud,
 And disinherit chaos, that reigns here." Milton: Comus, 333, 334.

dis-in-hër'-it-änce, s. [Pref. dis, and English inheritance.]

1. The act of disinheriting.

"Sedition tendeth to the disinheritance of the king." State Trials: W. Stroud (1620).

2. The state or condition of being disinherited.

dis-in-të-grät'-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DISINTEGRATE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The process of separating a solid into its integrant parts; disintegration.

dis-in-të-grä'-tion, s. [Lat. dis=away, apart, and integratio=a making whole; integer=whole.] [INTEGER.]

I. Literary:

1. Ord. Lang.: The breaking asunder of a solid body into its integrant parts.

2. Geol.: The wearing down of rocks caused chiefly by the slow action of frosts, rains, and other atmospheric influences. The facility with which some kinds of rocks are acted upon by these influences depends partly on their chemical composition, partly on the aggregation of their particles, and partly on the readiness with which they absorb moisture.

II. Fig.: A solution of integrity, a reduction into component particles.

"The character, therefore, underwent a marked disintegration by severance into distinct parts." W. E. Gladstone: Studies on Homer (1858), vol. ii., § ii., p. 44.

dis-in-të-grät'-ör, s. [Eng. disintegrator (e); -ör.] 1. A machine for grinding or pulverizing bones, guano, &c., for manure.

"Some firms use the disintegrator for grinding the clay . . . This machine . . . may be briefly described as a series of cages of iron bars, which are made to revolve rapidly in alternately different directions." G. R. Redgrave, in Cassell's Technical Educator, pt. ii., p. 267.

2. A mill in which grain is broken into a fine dust by beaters projecting from the faces of parallel metallic discs revolving in contrary directions. The grain is fed in at the center, and in falling is caught by the horizontal bars which project from the rapidly rotating discs. The grain acquires a vortical motion which by centrifugal impulse is caused to run the gauntlet of the beaters, which are in concentric series, and run in alternate directions and at high velocity. (Knight.) [FLOUR-MILL.]

dis-in-tër, dis-in-terre, v. t. [Pref. dis, and Eng. inter (q. v.).]

1. Lit.: To unbury, to take out of a grave or the earth; to exhume.

"Isis (their goddess now) I'll disinterre." May: Lucan, bk. ix.

2. Fig.: To bring to light, as from obscurity or oblivion.

"The philosopher, the saint, or the hero, the wise, the good, or the great man, very often lie hid and concealed in a plebeian, which a proper education might have disinterred." Addison: Spectator, No. 215.

dis-in-tër-ësséd, a. [Fr. désintéressé=disinterested, pa. par. of désintéresser=to get rid of all interest in.] Disinterested. [DISINTERESTED.]

B. Intrans.: To fall in pieces.

"Let the frame of things disjoint, both the worlds suffer."—Shakesp.: Macbeth, iii. 2.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to disjoint and to dismember: "The terms here spoken of derive their distinct meaning and application from the signification of the words joint and member. A limb of the body may be disjointed if it be so put out of the joint that it cannot act; but the body itself is dismembered when the different limbs or parts are separated from each other. So in the metaphorical sense our ideas are said to be disjointed when they are so thrown out of their order that they do not fall in with one another; and kingdoms are said to be dismembered where any part or parts are separated from the rest." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dis-jöint, dis-joynt, dis-joynte, a. & s. [O. Fr. desjoindre, pa. par. of desjoindre.]

dis-lik-a-ble, a. [Eng. dislik(e); -able.] Deserving of being disliked; unpleasant, disagreeable.

"On the whole, as matters go, that is not the most dislikable."—Carlyle. (Opitvie.)

dis-li-ke, s. [Prefix dis, and Eng. like, s. (q. v.).] 1. A feeling of disinclination, disapprobation, or aversion; an absence of fondness or affection; distaste, repugnance.

"Joan Dalrymple was regarded with incurable distrust and dislike."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

*2. Discord, disagreement, dissension.

"This said Aletes, and a murmur rose That showed dislike among the Christian peers."

Fairfax: Godfrey of Bouillon.

¶ (1) Crabb thus discriminates between dislike, disgust, displeasure, dissatisfaction, and distaste: "Dislike and dissatisfaction denote the feeling or sentiment produced either by persons or things; displeasure, that produced by persons only; distaste and disgust, that produced by things only. In regard to persons, dislike is the sentiment of equals and persons unconnected; displeasure and dissatisfaction, of superiors, or such as stand in some sort of relation to us. Strangers may feel a dislike upon seeing each other; parents or masters may feel displeasure or dissatisfaction: the former sentiment is occasioned by their supposed faults in character; the latter by their supposed defective services. I dislike a person for his assumption or loquacity, I am displeased with him for his carelessness, and dissatisfied with his labor. The displeasure is awakened by whatever is done amiss; the dissatisfaction is caused by what happens amiss or contrary to our expectation. Accordingly, the word dissatisfaction is not confined to persons of a particular rank, but to the nature of the connection which subsists between them. Whoever does not receive what he thinks himself entitled to from another is dissatisfied. A servant may be dissatisfied with the treatment he meets with from his master; and may be said therefore to express dissatisfaction, though not displeasure. In regard to things, dislike is a casual feeling not arising from any specific cause. A dissatisfaction is connected with our desires and expectations: we dislike the performance of an actor from one or many causes, or from no apparent cause; but we are dissatisfied with his performance if it fall short of what we were led to expect. In order to lessen the number of our dislikes we ought to endeavor not to dislike without a cause; and in order to lessen our dissatisfaction, we ought to be moderate in our expectation. Dislike, distaste, and disgust rise on each other in their signification. The distaste is more than the dislike, and the disgust more than the distaste. The dislike is a partial feeling, quickly produced and quickly subsiding; the distaste is a settled feeling, gradually produced, and permanent in its duration; the disgust is either transitory or otherwise; momentarily or gradually produced, but stronger than either of the two others.

(2) He thus discriminates between dislike and disinclination: "Dislike applies to what one has or does; disinclination only to what one does: we dislike the thing we have, or dislike to do the thing; but we are disinclined to do the thing. They express a similar feeling that differs in degree. The disinclination is but a small degree of dislike: the dislike marks something contrary; the disinclination does not amount to more than the absence of an inclination. None but a disliking temper has a dislike to comply with reasonable requests; but the most obliging disposition may have an occasional disinclination to comply with a particular request." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dis-li-ke, v. t. [Prefix dis, and Eng. like, v. (q. v.).] 1. To have a feeling of dislike, repugnance, or aversion toward; to regard with repugnance or disinclination.

Ital. dismagare; Ital. smagare=to lose courage. (Skeat.)]

A. Transitive:

1. To deprive of courage or spirit; utterly to discourage or dishearten; to terrify, to affright, to daunt.

"It broke with thunder long and loud, Dismayed the brave, appalled the proud."
Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel, vi. 25.

*2. To subdue, to vanquish.

"When the bold Centaures made that bloody fray
With the fierce Lapithes, which did them dismay."
Spenser.

B. Reflex.: To discourage, to affright, to allow to lose courage.

"Desmaje you no longer."
William of Palerne, 3,040.

C. Intrans.: To be dismayed, discouraged, or dispirited; to be agast; to lose heart or courage.

"He bad hem not desmayghen."
Joseph of Arimathea, 31.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to dismay, to daunt, and to appal: "The effect of fear on the spirit is strongly expressed by all these terms; but

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wolf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mātē, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, sȳrian. æ, œ=ē; ey=ā. qu=kw.

dismay expresses less than daunt, and this than appal. We are dismayed by alarming circumstances; we are daunted by terrifying, we are appalled by horrid circumstances. A severe defeat will dismay so as to lessen the force of resistance; the fiery glare from the eyes of a ferocious beast will daunt him who was venturing to approach; the sight of an apparition will appal the stoutest heart." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dis-mā'yd (1), a. [Pref. dis- and Mid. Eng. mayd=Eng. made.] Ugly, ill-shaped, deformed, hideous.

"Whose hideous shapes were like to feeders of hell,
Some like to hounds, some like to apes, dismayd,
Some like to puttocks, all in plumes arrayd,
All shap't according their conditions."

Spenser: F. Q., II. xi. 11.

"Dismiss her fetters."—Mrs. Behn: The Young King (1688), p. 63.

*7. To leave off, to discontinue.

"Dismiss your vows, your feigned tears."

Shakesp.: Venus and Adonis, 425.

II. Law: To refuse or reject; to discharge from further consideration.

"Their lordships yesterday dismissed the appeal with costs."—London Daily Telegraph.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to dismiss, to discharge, and to discard: "The idea of removing to a distance is included in all these terms, but with various collateral circumstances. Dismiss is the general term; discharge and discard are modes of dismissing; dismiss is applicable to persons of all stations, but used more particularly for the higher orders; discharge, on the other hand, is confined to those in a subordinate station. A clerk is dismissed; a menial servant is discharged; an officer is dismissed; a soldier is discharged. Neither dismiss nor discharge defines the motive of the action; they are used indifferently for that which is voluntary, or the contrary; discard, on the contrary, always marks a dismissal that is not agreeable to the party discarded. A person may request to be dismissed or discharged, but never to be discarded. The dismissal or discharge frees a person from the obligation or necessity of performing a certain duty; the discarding throws him out of a desirable rank or station. They are all applied to things in the moral sense: we are said to dismiss our fears, to discharge a duty, and to discard a sentiment from the mind." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dis-miss', s. [DISMISS, v.] A dismissal, a discharge.

"His majesty's servants, with great expressions of grief for their dismiss, poured forth their prayers for his majesty's freedom and preservation."—Sir T. Herbert: Mem. of Chas. I., p. 14.

II. Med.: An irregularity, derangement or disturbance in the functions of the animal economy; a disease, an illness.

† Crabb thus discriminates between disorder, disease, distemper, and malady: "All these terms agree in their application to the state of the animal body. Disorder is the general term, and the others specific. In this general sense disorder is altogether indefinite; but in its restricted sense it expresses less than all the rest; it is the mere commencement of a disease; disease is also more general than the other terms; for it comprehends every serious and permanent disorder in the animal economy, and is therefore of universal application. The disorder is slight, partial, and transitory; the disease is deep-rooted and permanent. The disorder may lie in the extremities; the disease lies in the humors and the vital parts. Occasional headaches, colds, or what is merely cutaneous, are termed disorders; fevers, dropies, and the like are diseases. Distemper is used for such particularly as throw the animal frame most completely out of its temper or course, and is consequently applied properly to virulent disorders, such as the small-pox. Malady has less of a technical sense than the other terms; it refers more to the suffering than to the state of the body. There may be many maladies where there is no disease, but diseases are themselves, in general, maladies. Our maladies are frequently born with us; but our diseases may come upon us at any time of life. Blindness is in itself a malady, and may be produced by a disease in the eyes. . . . All these terms may be applied with a similar distinction to the mind as well as the body. . . . Any perturbation in the mind is a disorder; avarice is a disease; melancholy is a distemper as far as it throws the mind out of its bias; it is a malady as far as it occasions suffering." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dis-ōr-dēr, v. t. [DISORDER, s.]

1. To throw into disorder or confusion; to confuse, to derange, to put out of order.

*2. To disturb or derange the regularity of the functions of the animal economy; to cause sickness or indisposition in.

"They [the stomach, &c.] may, by particular impediments, be sometimes disordered or obstructed in their operations."—Shaftesbury: Enquiry concerning Virtue, bk. ii., pt. i., § 1.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, there; pīne, pīt, sire, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, sŷrian. æ, æ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

3. To derange or cause disorder in the mental functions.

"Devotion itself may disorder the mind, unless its heats are tempered with caution or prudence."—Addison.

4. To discompose, to disturb; to ruffle the mind.

"We should never suffer them to be dissolved into levity, or disordered into a wanton frame."—Burrow Sermon on Ephesians, v. 4.

*5. To expel or degrade from holy orders; to disordain.

"Let him be stript of his habit and disordered; I would fain see him walk in quervo, that the world may behold the inside of a friar."—Dryden: Spanish Friar, v. 2.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to disorder, to derange, to disconcert, and to discompose: "All these terms express the idea of putting out of order; but the three latter vary as to the mode or object of the action. The term disorder is used in a perfectly indefinite form, and might be applied to any object. As every thing may be in order, so may every thing be disordered; yet it is seldom used except in regard to such things as have been in a natural order. Derange and disconcert are employed for such things as have been put into an artificial order. To derange is to disorder that which has been systematically arranged, or put in a certain range; and to disconcert is to disorder that which has been put together by concert or contrivance; thus the body may be disordered; a man's affairs or papers deranged; a scheme disconcerted. To discompose is a species of derangement in regard to trivial matters: thus a tucker, a frill, or a cap may be discomposed. The slightest change of diet will disorder people of tender constitutions; misfortunes are apt to derange the affairs of the most prosperous: the unexpected return of a master to his home disconcerts the schemes which have been formed by the domestics: those who are particular as to their appearance are careful not to have any part of their dress discomposed. When applied to the mind, disorder and derange are said of the intellect; disconcert and discompose of the ideas or spirits: the former denoting a permanent state, the latter a temporary or transient state. The mind is said to be disordered when the faculty of ratiocination is in any degree interrupted; the intellect is said to be deranged when it is brought into a positive state of incapacity for action: persons are sometimes disordered in their minds for a time by particular occurrences, who do not become actually deranged: a person is said to be disconcerted who suddenly loses his collectedness of thinking; he is said to be discomposed who loses his regularity of feeling. A sense of shame is the most apt to disconcert; the more irritable the temper, the more easily one is discomposed." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dis-pār'-age (age as ig), v. t. [O. Fr. desparager = to disparage, to offer unto a man unworthy conditions; des = Lat. dis = away, apart, and parage = lineage, rank, from Low Lat. paradicum, paragium = society, rank, equality of rank; Lat. par = equal; O. Fr. déparager; Low Lat. disparago. (Skeat.)]

*1. To marry to one of inferior rank or position; to match unequally; to dishonor or lower by marriage with an inferior.

*2. To match or unite unequally, or with anything of an inferior class.

*3. To injure by comparison with anything of less value.

*4. To bring reproach or disgrace upon; to dishonor, to disgrace; to lower in estimation or value.

"Thus he doth disparage

His blode with fonde dotage."

Skelton: Duke of Albany and the Scots.

*5. To think lightly of, to treat with contempt, to depreciate.

"The actors think themselves disparaged by the poet."

—Dryden: Essays on Dramatic Poesy.

6. To traduce, to decry, to asperse.

"Who durste be so bold to disparage

My doughter that is come of such linage."

Chaucer: C. T., 4,289, 4,270.

* (1) Crabb thus discriminates between to disparage, to disparde, to traduce, to depreciate, to degrade, and to decry: "The idea of lowering the value of an object is common to all these words, which differ in the circumstances and object of the action. Disparagement is the most indefinite in the manner: delect and traduce are specific in the forms by which an object is lowered: disparagement respects the mental endowments and qualifications: delect and traduce are said of the moral character; the former, however, in a less specific manner than the latter. We disparage a man's performance by speaking slightly of it; we delect from the merits of a person by ascribing his success to chance; we traduce him by handing about tales that are unfavorable to his reputation; thus authors are apt to disparage the writings of their rivals; or a soldier may delect from the skill of his commander; or he may traduce him by relating scandalous reports. To disparage, delect, and traduce, can be applied only to persons, or that which is personal; depreciate, degrade, and decry, to whatever is an object of esteem: we depreciate and degrade, therefore, things as well as persons, and decry things. To depreciate will be mild compared to that used for degrading: we may depreciate an object by implication, or in indirect terms; but harsh and unseemly epithets are employed for degrading; thus, a man may be said to depreciate human nature, who does not represent it as capable of its true elevation; he degrades it who sinks it below the scale of rationality. We may depreciate or degrade an individual, a language, and the like; we decry measures and principles: the former two are an act of an individual; the latter is properly the act of many."

(2) He thus further discriminates between to disparage, to degrade, and to derogate: "Disparage is here employed, not as the act of persons, but of things, in which case it is allied to derogate, but retains its indefinite and general sense as before: circumstances may disparage the performances of a writer; or they may derogate from the honors and dignities of an individual: it would be a high disparagement to an author to have it known that he had been guilty of plagiarism; it derogates from the dignity of a magistrate to take part in popular measures. To degrade is here, as in the former case, a much stronger expression than the other two: whatever disparages or derogates does but take away a part from the value; but whatever degrades sinks many degrees in the estimation of those in whose eyes it is degraded: in this manner religion is degraded by the low arts of its enthusiastic professors: whatever may tend to the disparagement does injury to the cause of truth, whatever derogates from the dignity of a man in any office is apt to degrade the office itself." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

*dis-pār'-ā-ge, s. [DISPARAGE, v.]

1. An unequal match; a lowering in dignity or estimation by marriage with an inferior.

"To match so high: her friends, with counsell sage,

Dissuaded her from such a disparage."

Spenser: F. Q., IV. vii. 60.

2. A disparagement; a cause of contempt or disgrace.

"It were a disparage

To his estate, so low for to alight."

Chaucer: C. T., 8,784, 8,785.

*dis-pār'-age-a-ble (age as ig), a. [Eng. disparage; -able.] Causing disparagement or disgrace; lowering.

"They disdain this marriage with Dudley as altogether disparageable and most unworthy of the blood royal, and regal majesty."—Camden: Elizabeth (an. 1563). dis-pār'-aged (aged as igd), pa. par. or a. [DISPARAGE, v.]

dis-pār'-age-mēt (age as ig), *dis-per-gment, *dis-per-ge-mēte, s. [Eng. disparage; -ment.]

*1. The act of marrying an heir or heiress with one of inferior rank or position; an unequal match.

"You wrongfully do require Mopsa to so great a disparagement as to wed her father's servant."—Sidney: Arcadia.

*2. An injury to position or reputation by marriage with an inferior.

"Offering to his ward couenable marriage without disparagement before the age of xxi years."—Smith: The Commonwealth, bk. iii., ch. v.

3. The act of disparaging, depreciating, or lowering the reputation of; depreciation, detraction.

4. A cause of loss of honor or reputation; a reproach, a disgrace, an indignity.

"There is here a rag, and there a rent, to the disparagement of their Lord."—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. ii.

* It is followed by to before the person or thing disparaged.

"Without disparagement to any or all of those most respectable princes and grandees."—Burke: On Mr. Fox's East India Bill.

dis-pār'-ag-ēr (ag as ig), s. [Eng. disparag (e); -er.] One who disparages, depreciates, or treats with contempt; one who brings disgrace or contempt upon.

"To lessen the authority of the disparagers of Scripture."—Boyle: Workes, ii. 302.

dis-pār'-ag-ing (ag as ig), pr. par., a. & s. [DISPARAGE, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of lowering in estimation, depreciating, or traducing; disparagement.

dis-pār'-ag-ing-ly (ag as ig), adv. [Eng. disparaging; -ly.] In a disparaging, depreciatory, or contemptuous manner.

"Why should he speak so disparagingly of many books and much reading?"—Peters: On Job.

*dis-pār'-ate, a. & s. [Lat. disparatus, pa. par. of disparo = to put asunder, to separate; dis = away, apart, and paro = to prepare.]

A. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Unlike, dissimilar, discordant.

"Altogether, the two accounts are quite disparate."—Levis: Cred. Early Rom. Hist. (1855), ch. xii., pt. 1., § 9.

2. Logic: Pertaining to two coördinate species or divisions.

B. As subst. (pl.): Things so unlike that they cannot be compared with each other.

"Words which are differing one from another, but not contrary; as, heat and cold are contraries, but heat and moisture disparates."—Cockeram.

*dis-pār'-ent, a. [Lat. dis = away, apart, and pareo = to appear.] Variegated; variable.

"Nature, so disparient in her creatures."

Chapman: Homer's Iliad, bk. ii.

*dis-par'-i-tion, s. [Fr.] A disappearing or disappearance.

"They might think his disparition should be sudden and insensible."—Bp. Hall: Contemplations.

dis-pār'-i-tŷ, s. [Prefix dis, and Eng. parity (q. v.).]

1. Inequality; a difference in degree, either of rank or excellence.

"The disparity of years Between you and your son."

Masinger: Unnatural Combat, i. 1.

2. Unlikeness, dissimilitude.

"A being without any dissimilitude or disparity."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 21.

* Crabb thus discriminates between disparity and inequality: The disparity applies to two objects which should meet or stand in coalition with each other; the inequality is applicable to those that are compared with each other: the disparity of age, situation, and circumstances is to be considered with regard to persons entering into the matrimonial connection; the inequality in the portion of labor which is to be performed by two persons, is a ground for the inequality of their recompense: there is a great inequality in the chance of success, where there is a disparity of acquisitions in rival candidates: the disparity between David and Goliath was such as to render the success of the former more strikingly miraculous; the inequality in the conditions of men is not attended with a corresponding inequality in their happiness." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

*dis-park', v. t. [Pref. dis, and Eng. park (q. v.).]

I. Lit.: To throw open a park; to divest of the character of a park.

"You have fed upon my signories,

Disparked my parks, and felled my forest woods."

Shakesp.: Richard II., iii. 1.

II. Figuratively:

1. To throw open.

"The veil of the Temple divided of itself, and . . . disparked the Sanctuary, and made it puerous to the Gentile's eye."—Bp. Taylor: Rule of Conscience, bk. i., ch. iv.

2. To set at large, to release from inclosure or restraint.

"His free muse threw down the pale,

And did at once dispark them all."

Waller: To Master Evelyn.

dis-parked, pa. par. or a. [DISPARK.]

"They leave traitorously the flocks to the woulfe to be disperpled abroad and torne in pieces."—Erasmus: John x., p. 76.

B. Intrans.: To be dispersed or scattered.

"Scheep . . . the which depareth and desparpleth."—Maundeville, p. 4.

dis-part', v. t. & i. [Lat. dispartior = to separate; dis = away, apart, and partior = to divide, to separate; par = a part.]

A. Transitive:

*I. Ordinary Language:

1. To divide, separate, or break up into parts; to sever, to rend, to rive, to burst.

"On either side

Disparted chaos." Milton: P. L., x. 415, 416.

2. To distract.

"When all three kinds of love together meet,
And doe dispart the heart with powre extreme,
Whether shall weigh the balance down?"

Spenser: F. Q., IV. ix. 1.

fāte, fāt, fāre. amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mātē, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

II. Gunnery.

1. To cast or fix a piece of metal on the muzzle of a piece of ordnance, so as to bring the line of sight parallel to the axis of the piece.

*2. To make allowance for the dispart in taking aim.

"Every gunner, before he shoots, must truly dispart his piece."—Lucas: Arte of Shooting (1583).

*B. Intransitive:

1. To separate or divide into parts; to open, to cleave.

"The flood disparts."—Thomson: Summer, 709.

2. To part.

"The professor's cast-off suit, which he disparts with biennially."—Scott: Abbot, ch. ix.

dis-part, s. [DISPART, v.]

Gunnery:

1. The difference between the muzzle and breech thicknesses of a piece of ordnance. A piece of metal is cast on the muzzle to bring the line of sight parallel to the axis of the piece, and is known as the Dispart-sight or Muzzle-sight.

2. A dispart-sight (q. v.).

dispart-sight, s. A gun-sight, to allow for the dispart, and bring the line of sight and the axis of the piece into parallelism.

dis-part-éd, pa. par. or a. [DISPART.]

dis-part-lîng, pr. par., a. & s. [DISPART.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

*1. Ord. Lang.: The act of dividing, separating, or cleaving into parts.

*2. Gunnery: The act or process of furnishing with a dispart-sight.

dis-par-tle, dis-par-tel-yn, v. t. [A variant of dispartle (q. v.)] To scatter, to disperse abroad.

"Dispartelym. Dissipo, dispergo."—Prompt. Parv.

dis-päs-sion (sion as shôn), s. [Pref. dis, and Eng. passion (q. v.)] A freedom from passion or perturbation of mind; apathy; peace or quiet of mind.

"What is called by the Stoics apathy, or dispassion, is called by the Sceptics indisturbance."—Temple: On Gardening.

dis-päs-sion-ate (sion as shôn), a. [Pref. dis, and Eng. passionate (q. v.)]

1. Of persons: Free from passion; cool, calm, impartial, temperate, composed, unbiased.

"A critic on the sacred book should be Candid and learned, dispassionate and free."

Couper: Progress of Error, i. 452, 453.

2. Of things: Not dictated by or done in passion; quiet, moderate, impartial.

"Reason requires a calm and dispassionate situation of the mind."—Search: Light of Nature, vol. i., ch. xii.

*Crabb thus discriminates between dispassionate and cool: "Dispassionate is taken negatively, it marks merely the absence of passion; cool is taken positively, it marks an entire freedom from passion. Those who are prone to be passionate must learn to be dispassionate; those who are of a cool temperament will not suffer their passions to be roused. Dispassionate solely respects the angry or irritable sentiment; cool respects every perturbed feeling; when we meet with an angry disputant it is necessary to be dispassionate in order to avoid quarrels; in the moment of danger our safety often depends upon our coolness." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dis-päs-sion-ate-lý (sion as shôn), adv. [Eng. dispassionate; -ly.] In a dispassionate, cool, calm, or temperate manner.

"They are here delivered dispassionately."—Warton: Notes on Milton.

"Many highly pauperized districts in more recent times, which have been dispauperized by adopting strict rules of poor-law administration."—J. S. Mill.

dis-pé-ace, s. [Pref. dis, and Eng. peace (q. v.)] A want or absence of peace or quiet; disquiet, disension.

"This affair . . . afterward led to much dispeace and heart-burning between the families."—Russell: The Hays of Bemersyde (1881), p. 122.

dis-pël, v. t. & i. [Lat. dispello=to drive away; dis=away, apart, and pello=to drive.]

A. Trans.: To drive away, to dissipate, to disperse, to clear away.

"The acclamations of the devoted thousands who surrounded him wherever he turned could not dispel the gloom which sate on his brow."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

*B. Intrans.: To be dispersed or dissipated; to separate.

*Crabb thus discriminates between to dispel and to disperse: "Dispel is a more forcible action than to disperse; we destroy the existence of a thing by dispelling it; we merely destroy the junction or cohesion of a body by dispersing it: the sun dispels the clouds and darkness; the wind disperses the clouds, or a surgeon disperses a tumor. Dispel is used figuratively; disperse only in the natural sense: gloom, ignorance, and the like are dispelled; books, papers, people, and the like are dispersed." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dis-pël-led, pa. par. or a. [DISPEL.]

dis-pël-lër, s. [Eng. dispel; -er.] One who or that which dispels, scatters, or disperses.

Pope: Homer's Odyssey, xvi. 412, 413.

2. To cause aversion or disgust; to be offensive.

"Foul sights do rather displease, in that they excite a memory of foul things."—Bacon: Natural History.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to displease, to offend, and to vex: "Displease is not always applied to that which personally concerns ourselves; although offend and vex have always more or less of what is personal in them: a superior may be displeased with one who is under his charge for improper behavior toward persons in general; he will be offended with him for disrespectful behavior toward himself; circumstances as well as actions serve to displease; a supposed intention or design is requisite in order to offend: we may be displeased with a person, or at a thing; one is mostly offended with the person: a child may be displeased at not having any particular liberty or indulgence granted to him; he may be offended with his playfellow for an act of incivility or unkindness. Displease respects mostly the inward state of feeling; offend and vex have most regard to the outward cause which provokes the feeling: a humorous person may be displeased without any apparent cause; but a captious person will at least have some avowed trifle for which he is offended. Vex expresses more than offend; it marks, in fact, frequent efforts to offend, or the act of offending under aggravated circumstances: we often unintentionally displease or offend; but he who vexes has mostly that object in view in so doing; any instance of neglect displeases; any marked instance of neglect offends; and any aggravated instance of neglect vexes: the feeling of displeasure is more perceptible and vivid than that of offense; but it is less durable: the feeling of vexation is as transitory as that of displeasure, but stronger than either. Displeasure and vexation betray themselves by an angry word or look; offense discovers itself in the whole conduct: our displeasure is unjustifiable when it exceeds the measure of another's fault; it is a mark of great weakness to take offense at trifles; persons of the greatest irritability are exposed to the most frequent vexations." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dis-plē a-sed, *dis-pleased, pa. par. or a. [DISPLEASE.]

*dis-plē a-sēd-ly, adv. [Eng. displeased; -ly.] In a displeased or offended manner; with displeasure.

dis-pleas-ure (pleas as plēzh), s. [Pref. dis, and Eng. pleasure (q. v.).]

1. The feeling of one who is displeased; a feeling or state of annoyance, vexation, or irritation; anger, indignation.

"Thou churl, for this time, Though full of our displeasure, yet we free thee."
Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

2. Anything which displeases, offends, or annoys.

"Now shall I be more blameless than the Philistines, though I do them a displeasure."—Judges xv. 3.

3. A state of disgrace or disfavor; the condition of having displeased or offended another.

"He went into Poland, being in displeasure with the Pope for overmuch familiarity."—Peacham: On Music.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between displeasure, anger, and disapprobation: "Between displeasure and anger there is a difference in the degree, in the cause, and in the consequence, of the feeling: displeasure is always a softened and gentle feeling; anger is always a harsh feeling, and sometimes rises to vehemence and madness; displeasure is always produced by some adequate cause, real or supposed; but anger may be provoked by every or any cause, according to the temper of the individual; displeasure is mostly satisfied with a simple verbal expression, but anger, unless kept down with great force, always seeks to return evil for evil. Displeasure and disapprobation are to be compared inasmuch as they respect the conduct of those who are under the direction of others: displeasure is an act of the will; it is an angry sentiment; disapprobation is an act of the judgment, it is an opposite opinion: any mark of self-will in a child is calculated to excite displeasure; a mistaken choice in matrimony may produce disapprobation in the parent. Displeasure is always produced by that which is already come to pass; disapprobation may be felt upon that which is to take place: a master feels displeasure at the carelessness of his servant; a parent expresses his disapprobation of his son's proposal to leave his situation: it is sometimes prudent to check our displeasure; and mostly prudent to express our disapprobation." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

*dis-pleas-ure (pleas as plēzh), v. t. [DISPLEASE, s.] To cause displeasure, to displease, to offend, to annoy.

"When the way of pleasuring or displeasuring lieth by the favorite, it is impossible any other should be over great."—Bacon: Essays, Of Ambition.

*dis-plēn-ish, v. t. [Pref. dis, and Eng. plinish (q. v.).] To deprive of furniture of whatever kind.

"We were so sore displeished before, and so far out of use, that we had need of much more."—Baillie: Lett. 1, 166.

*dis-pli-ence, *dis-pli-ence-y, s. [Lat. displacencia, from displaceo=to displease; dis=away, apart, and placeo=to please.] Displeasure, annoyance, dislike.

"These obscure interjections of displacence and ill-humor."—Mountague: Devout Essays, pt. i, tr. ii, s. 2.

*dis-plō de, v. t. & i. [Lat. displodo: dis=away, apart, and plaudo=to strike, to beat, to clap.]

Disporting there like any other fly."
Byron: Child Harold, i. 4.

dis-pōrt'-ēd, pa. par. or a. [DISPORT, v.]

dis-pōrt'-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DISPORT, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

*1. Lit.: The act of carrying away or removing.

*2. Fig.: The act of amusing or diverting one's self.

"For any taking and disporting of goods."—Frynne: Treachery and Disloyalty, pt. iii, p. 45.

*dis-pōrt'-mēt, s. [Eng. disport; -ment.] The act of disporting or amusing one's self; disport, play, diversion.

dis-pōs'-a-ble, a. [Eng. dispos(e); -able.] That may or can be disposed of; free to be used as occasion may require.

"The disposable weight exceeding that required for the hull."—British Quarterly Review (1873), p. 111.

dis-pōs'-al, *dis-pōs'-all, s. [Eng. dispos(e); -al.]

1. The act of disposing, arranging, or regulating anything; a settling or arranging, as, The disposal of troops.

"By whose favorable disposal they had obtained the victory."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. i., ser. 8.

2. The power or right of arranging, regulating, or settling matters.

"I must yield myself without reserve
To his disposal."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. ii.

3. The power or right of distributing, conferring, or bestowing; control, discretion.

"The disposal of the crown . . . rested in all the congregation."—Frynne: Treachery and Disloyalty, pt. v., p. 125.

4. The act of disposing of, or of arranging and settling the bestowal or application of anything; disposition, as, the disposal of property by will.

"I am called off from public dissertations by a domestic affair of great importance, which is no less than the disposal of my sister Jenny for life."—Tatler, No. 75.

5. The order or arrangement in which things are disposed.

6. Divine dispensation.

"Tax not divine disposal. Wisest men Have erred, and by bad women been deceived."
Milton: Samson Agonistes, 210, 211.

† At or in the disposal of any one: In the power of or at the command or will of any one, to be disposed of, employed, or treated as he may think fit.

"To put the estates and the personal liberty of the whole people at the disposal of the Crown."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. l.

† Crabb thus discriminates between disposal and disposition: "Disposal is a personal act: it depends upon the will of the individual; disposition is an act of the judgment: it depends upon the nature of the thing. The removal of a thing from one's self is involved in a disposal: the good order of the things is comprehended in their disposition. The disposal of property is in the hands of the rightful owner; the success of a battle often depends upon the right disposition of an army." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dis-pō'se, *dis-poose, v. t. & i. [Fr. disposer; dis=away, apart, and poser=to place; Lat. positus, pa. par. of pono=to place; Sp. disponer; Ital. disponere.]

A. Transitive:

"The cities are disposed that the water that falleth downward . . . renneth into cisternes."—Trevisa, i. 109.

II. Figuratively:

*1. To arrange, to settle, to put or set in order; to adjust.

"Waked by the cries, th' Athenian chief arose,
The knightly forms of combat to dispose."
Dryden: Palamon and Arcite, iii. 484, 485.

*2. To determine, to regulate, to fix.

"They mount their seats: the lots their place dispose."
Pope: Homer's Iliad, xxiii. 427.

*3. To turn to any particular end or consequence.

"The lot of man the gods dispose."
Pope: Homer's Odyssey, xii. 47.

*4. To apply, to bestow.

"When these so noble benefits shall prove Not well disposed."
Shakesp.: Henry VIII., i. 2.

*5. To sell, to dispose of.

*6. To commit, to hand over.
"I dispose to you, as my father hath disposed to me, a rewme."—Wycliffe: Luke xxii. 29.

*7. To apply, to turn.

"Wheresoever he did himselfe dispose
He by no means could wished ease obtaine."
Spenser: F. Q., IV. v. 40.

8. To turn or frame the mind; to incline, to give a propensity or inclination. (Followed by to.)

"Suspicious dispose kings to tyranny, husbands to jealousy, and wise men to irresolution and melancholy."—Bacon: Essays Of Suspicion.

†9. To adapt, to fit. (Followed by for.)

"This may dispose me, perhaps, for the reception of truth; but helps me not to it."—Locke.

*B. Reflex.: To turn or apply one's self.

"Hooly Austyn disposid hym to masse."
Lydgate: Minor Poems, p. 142.

C. Intransitive:

1. To determine, to settle.

"Man proposes, God disposes,"—Old Proverb.

*2. To arrange, to settle matters, to come to terms.

"You did suspect
She had dispos'd with Caesar."
Shakesp.: Antony and Cleopatra, iv. 14.

3. To incline, to create an inclination or propensity. (Followed by to.)

"Saturn disposith to malencolye."
Lydgate: Minor Poems, p. 197.

† (1) To dispose of:

(a) To apply to any purpose.

" . . . to order their actions, and dispose of their possessions and persons, as they think fit."—Locke.

(b) To commit or put into the hands of another.

"As she is mine, I may dispose of her."
Shakesp.: Midsummer Night's Dream, i. 1.

(c) To give away by authority.

* (f) To conduct, to behave.

"They must receive instructions how to dispose of themselves when they come."—Bacon: To Villiers.

(g) To put away, to utilize, to use up.

"They require more water than can be found, and more than can be disposed of if it was found."—Burnet: Theory of the Earth.

(2) To dispose upon: To dispose of; to apply to any purpose or use.

"By the bond, he had power to dispose upon the money."—Gilmour: Supplementary Decrees, p. 488.

† Crabb thus discriminates between dispose, to arrange, and to digest: "The idea of a systematic laying apart is common to all and proper to the word dispose. We dispose when we arrange and digest; but we do not always arrange and digest when we dispose: they differ in the circumstances and object of the action. There is less thought employed in disposing than in arranging and digesting: we may dispose ordinary matters by simply assigning a place to each: in this manner trees are disposed in a row; but we arrange and digest by an intellectual effort . . . in this manner books are arranged in a library according to their size or their subject; the materials for a literary production are digested; or the laws of the land are digested. What is not wanted should be neatly disposed in a suitable place: nothing contributes so much to beauty and convenience as the arrangement of everything according to the way and manner in which it should follow: when writings are involved in great intricacy and confusion, it is difficult to digest them. In an extended and moral application of these words, we speak of a person's time, talent, and the like, being disposed to a good purpose; of a man's ideas being properly arranged, and of being digested into a form. On the disposition of a man's time and property will depend in a great measure his success in life; on the arrangement of accounts greatly depends his facility in conducting business; on the habit of digesting our thoughts depends in a great measure the correctness of thinking." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

† For the difference between dispose and to place, see PLACE.

*dis-pō'se, s. [DISPOSE, v.]

dis-pōs'-it-ēd, a. [Lat. dispositus.] Disposed, inclined.

"Some constitutions are genially disposed to this mental seriousness."—Glanvill: Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. xii.

dis-pōs'-i-tion, *dis-po-ci-cioun, *dis-po-si-cion, *dis-po-si-cioun, s. [Fr. disposition, from Lat. dispositio=an arranging, a setting in order, from dispositus, pa. par. of dispono=to arrange; Sp. disposition; Ital. disposizione.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) The act of disposing, arranging, or setting in order. [II. 5.]

(2) An arrangement, order, or distribution of things.

"Making dispositions which, in the worst event, would have secured his retreat."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ii.

2. Figuratively:

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: The arrangement of the whole design externally in plan, elevation, section, and perspective view; that is, by ichnography (plan), orthography (section and elevation), and scenography (perspective view).

2. Fine Arts: The general arrangement of a group, or the various parts of any picture or composition in regard to its general effect. The proper distribution of all which forms a composition for the artist's use. Composition may be considered as the general order or arrangement of a design: disposition as the particular order adopted. (Fairholt.)

3. Music: Arrangement (1) of the parts of a chord, with regard to the intervals between them; (2) of the parts of a score, with regard to their relative order; (3) of voices and instruments with a view to their greatest efficiency or to the convenience of their positions; (4) of the groups of pipes in an organ, or of the registers or stops bringing them under control. (Stainer & Barrett.)

4. Mil. (pl.): The marshaling and posting of troops in what the commander considers to be the most advantageous position for giving or receiving battle. It has this meaning in such a sentence as this: "The dispositions of Garibaldi were made with his usual skill."

(1) Crabb thus discriminates between disposition and temper: "These terms are both applied to the mind and its bias; but disposition respects the whole frame and texture of the mind; temper respects only the bias or tone of the feelings. The disposition is permanent and settled; the temper is transitory and fluctuating. The disposition comprehends the springs and motives of actions; the temper influences the actions for the time being: it is possible and not unfrequent to have a good disposition with a bad temper, and vice versa. A good disposition makes a man a useful member of society, but not always a good companion; a good temper renders him acceptable to all and peaceable with all, but essentially useful to none: a good disposition will go far toward correcting the errors of temper; but where there is a bad disposition there are no hopes of amendment."

(2) He thus discriminates between disposition and inclination: "The disposition is more positive than the inclination. We may always expect a man to do that which he is disposed to do; but we cannot always calculate upon his executing that to which he is merely inclined. We may indulge a disposition; we yield to an inclination. The disposition comprehends the whole state of the mind at the time; the inclination is particular, referring always to a particular object. . . . We should be careful not to enter into controversy with one who shows a disposition to be unfriendly. When a young person discovers any inclination to study there are hopes of his improvement." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

* For the difference between disposition and disposal, see DISPOSAL.

dis-pōs'-i-tion-al, a. [Eng. disposition; -al.] Of or pertaining to disposition.

dis-rē-gard, v. t. [Pref. dis, and Eng. regard, v. (q. v.).] To take no notice of, to neglect; to ignore, to slight, to pay no attention to.

"Such an appeal it was hardly possible to disregard."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. x.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between to disregard, to neglect, and to slight: "We disregard the warnings, the words, or opinions of others; we neglect their injunctions or their precepts. We disregard results from the settled purpose of the mind, we neglect from a temporary forgetfulness or oversight. What is disregarded is seen and passed over; what is neglected is generally not thought of at the time required. What is disregarded does not strike the mind at all; what is neglected enters the mind only when it is before the eye . . . What we disregard is not esteemed; what we neglect is often esteemed, but not sufficiently to be remembered or practiced; a child disregards the prudent counsels of a parent; he neglects to use the remedies which have been prescribed to him. Disregard and neglect are frequently not personal acts; they respect the thing more than the person; slight is altogether an intentional act toward an individual. We disregard or neglect things often from a heedlessness of temper, the consequence either of youth or habit; we slight a person from feelings of dislike or contempt. Young people should disregard nothing that is said to them by their superiors; nor neglect anything which they are enjoined to do; nor slight any one to whom they owe personal attention." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dis-rē-gard-ēd, pa. par. or a. [DISREGARD, v.] dis-rē-gard-ēr, s. [Eng. disregard; -er.] One who disregards, slights, or neglects.

Blackmore: Creation.

II. Ecclesiol. & Ch. Hist.: The rending of a church in twain or asunder, with more or less of noise or commotion, or the rending of a church, or a great part of it, from the state. The expression is a geological one, and calls up the image of rocks split or shattered by earthquake action or by a volcanic outburst. It is a stronger word than secession, the latter term denoting such a withdrawal from a religious body as to leave its numbers little diminished, while a disruption implies the departure of so large a part of a church as to leave it very seriously shattered, at least for a time.

The year 1844 was rendered memorable by ecclesiastical upheavals in two of the most respectable bodies of Christians among English-speaking peoples—one in this country and one in Britain.

1. The disruption of the Methodist Episcopal Church: For a long time previous to 1844 there had been an intense antagonism existent between factions of the Northern and Southern communicants, the question of slavery furnishing ground for contest. The Southern members were almost a unit in their advocacy of the institution of domestic slavery, while the Northern members were almost as solidly opposed to it. The contest had, however, been limited to sermonic and newspaper discussions until James O. Andrew, a slaveholder, was, by the General Conference, elected a bishop. The Northern members resolutely protested against the supervision of a slaveholding bishop, while the Southern contingent were equally determined that he should exercise his functions. After a stormy session of the Conference, steps were taken looking to a secession of the great body of the Southern membership. Led by such men as Leroy M. Lee, David S. Doggett, Lovick Pierce, Thomas O. Summers, Leonidas Rossier, J. E. Langhorne, and others, almost the entire body of communicants in the slaveholding states seceded, and established the Methodist Episcopal Church South, while the Northern wing of the body retained the old name. A bitter fight in the courts for the ownership of the church property ensued and resulted in a victory for the Southern church. For many years there was, as a result of this contest, the most intense animosity between the two branches of the church, but this is now happily, after the lapse of half a century, almost obliterated. (Editor.)

2. The disruption of the Church of Scotland: On May 27, 1834, the church, on the motion of Lord Moncrieff, with the approval of the celebrated Rev. Dr. Thomas Chalmers, leader of the evangelical party, who could not himself propose it, not being a member of that Assembly, passed the "Veto Act," giving a congregation authority to reject the patron's presentee if they deemed him unsuitable to their circumstances. Two days later this was followed by a Chapel Act, which accorded to ministers of Chapels of Ease, or quoad sacra charges, as they were often called, the same rights as parish ministers. The majority of the church believed that they had the power to pass these measures without consulting the state, and it was a series of subsequent decisions on the part of Her Majesty's judges, declaring them illegal, which ultimately produced the disruption.

In 1840 a case arose at Stewarston, in Ayrshire, designed to test the legality of the boon conferred on the quoad sacra members by the Chapel Act of 1834, and was decided against the church by the Court of Session again by a majority of eight to five judges, on January 20, 1843. This decision, which was never appealed against, produced a deadlock in the Assembly of 1843, the Evangelical party believing that the Court was incompetent if the quoad sacra ministers were absent; and the moderate party that its decisions would be rendered illegal if they were present. Appeals to successive governments to legislate had also been made, but in vain. The Rev. Dr. Welsh, the retiring moderator, and a prominent member of the Evangelical party, therefore read and tabled a protest, after which he moved toward the door. All who agreed with the protest followed him from the house. A deed of dismission was afterward signed by 474 members. Among the seceders were all the missionaries to India, to Africa, and to the Jews scattered abroad. The great secession now described constituted the "Disruption." (Buchanan: Ten Years' Conflict.)

B. As adj.: Pertaining or relating to, or which resulted from, the rending asunder of rocks, of churches, &c., as the Disruption controversy.

dis-rūpt-ive, a. [Eng. disrupt; -ive.]

It differs from a prorogation, which is the continuance of a parliament from one session to another, and from an adjournment, which is its continuance from one day to another. A dissolution is the civil death of a parliament; and this may be effected in three ways: (1) By the will of the Sovereign. (2) By the demise of the crown. This dissolution formerly happened immediately upon the death of the reigning sovereign, but it being found inconvenient to call together a new parliament immediately on the inauguration of the successor, and dangers being apprehended from having no parliament in being in cases of a disputed succession, it is provided by several statutes that the parliament in being shall continue for six months after the death of any sovereign, unless sooner prorogued or dissolved by the successor. (3) A parliament may be dissolved or expire by length of time. As the constitution now stands the parliament must expire, or die a natural death, at the end of every seventh year, if not sooner dissolved by the royal prerogative.

2. To fall to pieces; to become broken by the disunion of its parts.

"The great globe itself, Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve."
Shakespeare: Tempest, iv. 1.

3. To be resolved into its natural elements; to decompose.

"The perit form, that God hath given to other man,
Or other beast, dissolve it shall to earth where it began."
Surrey: Ecclesiastes, ch. iii.

*4. To lose physical strength; to faint, to give way.

"If there be more, more woeful, hold it in;
For I am almost ready to dissolve, Hearing of this."
Shakespeare: Lear, v. 3.

5. To be affected mentally; to become languid or powerless.

"Till all dissolving in the trance we lay,
And in tumultuous raptures died away."
Pope: Sappho to Phaon, 61, 62.

*6. To fall away; to lose power.

"The charm dissolves apace."
Shakespeare: Tempest, v. 1.

7. To dismiss or break up a meeting or assembly; to order or cause the dissolution of any body met for consultation or deliberation.

"William had chosen a fortunate moment for dissolving."
Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxi.

8. To be dismissed or dissolved; to break up, to disperse.

"The Stygian council thus dissolved, and forth In order came the grand Infernal Peers."
Milton: P. L., ii. 506.

dis-sôlv'ed, pa. par. or a. [DISSOLVE.]

dis-sôlv'-vent, a. & s. [Lat. dissolvens, pr. par. of dissolver=to loosen, to dissolve.]

A. As adj.: Having the power or property of dissolving or melting.

"...swallowed into the stomach, where, being mingled with dissolvent juices, it is concocted, macerated, and reduced into a chyle."—Ray: On the Creation, pt. 1.

B. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: Anything which has the power or property of dissolving or converting a solid body into a fluid, or of separating the parts of a solid substance, so that they shall mix with a liquid.

"Spittle is a great dissolvent, and there is a great quantity of it in the stomach, being swallowed constantly."
Arbuthnot.

2. Fig.: Anything which dissolves or breaks up.

"The secret treaty of December acted as an immediate dissolvent to the truce."—Motley.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: A menstruum or solvent.

2. Med.: A medicine or preparation intended to dissolve or disperse concretions in the body, as calculi, tubercles, &c.

dis-sôlv'-vër, s. [Eng. dissolv(e); -er.]

1. That which has the power of dissolving; a dissolvent.

"Hot mineral waters are the best dissolvers of phlegm."
—Arbuthnot.

2. One who or that which dissolves, disperses, or destroys.

"Thou kind dissolver of encroaching care."
Ottway: Windsor Castle.

dis-sôlv'-îng, pr. par., a. & s. [DISSOLVE.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Causing or suffering dissolution, melting, or liquefaction; making or becoming liquid; loosening, relaxing.

"Their joints they supple with dissolving oil."
Pope: Homer's Iliad, x. 676.

2. Breaking up, dismissing, dispersing, or vanishing.

"Here, awful Newton, the dissolving clouds Form, fronting on the sun, thy showery prism."
Thomson: Spring, 208, 209.

C. As substantive:

1. The act or process of making liquid; the state of becoming liquid.

2. The act of dismissing, breaking up, or dispersing.

dissolving-views, s. pl. Pictures painted on glass slides, which can be made to appear or disappear at pleasure by a peculiar arrangement of the magic-lantern or the stereopticon. Two magic-lanterns are placed side by side, their lens-tubes slightly convergent, so that each will deliver its picture on the same portion of the screen. A tapering-plate slides in front of both tubes, and is so arranged that it may shut off the aperture of either or allow a portion of the image from each to pass to the screen. One being closed, the other is fully displayed. Now, by moving the shutter, the image from the exhibited picture is gradually dimmed and that of the other as gradually develops. When the shutter is midway, the pictures are equally prominent and are therefore confused. The shutter continuing to move, the new picture commences to predominate, and eventually occupies the screen entirely, the other image being excluded. A change of pictures now being made in the darkened lantern, it is ready for the return motion of the shutter, which makes a similar change to that just described. The name is well given, as the pictures gradually dissolve into each other, there being no sudden removal, change, or substitution. (Knight.)

¶ Dissolving-views are believed to have been first invented by Henry Langdon Child, who died at an advanced age, in A. D. 1874.

dis-sô-nance, s. [Fr. dissonance; Span. dissonancia; Ital. dissonanza; from Lat. dissonantia, from dissonans, pr. par. of dissono=to differ or disagree in sound; dis=away, apart, and sono=to sound; sonus=sound.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: A mixture of harsh, inharmonious sounds, causing an unpleasant effect on the ear; a discordant combination of sounds.

"The wonted roar was up amidst the woods,
And filled the air with barbarous dissonance."
Milton: Comus, 549, 550.

2. Fig.: Disagreement; want of accord or harmony.

"The levity and dissonance of later writers."—Speed: Henry IV., bk. ix., ch. xii., § 18.

dis-syl'-láb-ýo, *dis-syl'-láb-ick, a. [French dissyllabique.] Consisting of two syllables only.

"The accent is intreated to the first, as in all nouns dissyllabick."—B. Jonson: Eng. Grammar.

dis-syl'-láb-í-fl-cá-tion, s. [Eng. dissyllabify; -ation.] The act of forming into two syllables.

dis-syl'-láb-í-fy, v. t. [Mid. Eng. dissyllabe=a dissyllable; i connective, and Lat. facio (pass. fio) =to make.] To make or form into two syllables.

dis-syl'-lá-bize, v. t. [Mid. Eng. dissyllabe=dissyllable, and Eng. suff. -ize.] To form into two syllables; to dissyllabify.

dis-syl'-lá-ble, s. & a. [Fr. dissyllabe=(a.) dissyllabic, (s.) a dissyllable, from Lat. dissyllabus; Gr. dissyllabos=of two syllables: dis=twice, two-fold, and syllabé=a syllable; Ital. dissilabo.] [SYLLABLE.]

A. As subst.: A word consisting of only two syllables.

"Grahame being, on the other side of the Tweed, usually pronounced as a dissyllable."—Scott: Vision of Don Roderick. (Note.)

B. As adj.: Dissyllabic.

"Diversified by dissyllable and trisyllable terminations."—Johnson: Preface to Shakespeare.

dis-tác-kle, v. t. [Pref. dis, and Eng. tackle (q. v.).] To deprive of tackle, rigging, &c.

"Tossed their distackled fleet to the shore of Libya."—Warner: Albion's England. Addit. to bk. ii.

dis-tác-kled (kled as keld), pa. par. or a. [DISTACKLE.]

dis-táf, *dis-stafe, *dis-taf, *dis-tafe, *dis-tafe, s. [A. S. distáf: dis* or dise*, cognate with Low Dut. diesse=a bunch of flax on a distaff, and A. S. staf=a staff.]

1. Lit.: A cleft stick about three feet long, on which wool or carded cotton was wound in the ancient mode of spinning. The distaff was held under the left arm, and the fibers of cotton drawn from it were twisted spirally by the forefinger and thumb of the right hand. The thread, as it was spun, was wound on a reel which was suspended from and revolved with the thread during spinning.

2. Fig.: Used as an emblem of the female sex; a woman; women collectively.

"In my civil government some say the crossier, some say the distaff was too busy."—Howell: Engl. Tears.

† Descent by distaff: Descent on the mother's or female side.

distaff-day, *St. Distaff's day, a name jocularly given to the day after Twelfth-day, because on that day the Christmas festivities came to an end, and on the day following (January 7) the women used to return to their distaffs or daily occupation. It was also called Rock-day, rock in Mid. Eng. Italian Peasant Girl being=a distaff.

"Partly work and partly play, Ye must on St. Distaff's day."

Herrick: Hesperides.

distaff-side, s. The mother's or female side of a family or descent.

distaff-thistle, s.

Bot.: Carthamus alatus.

distaff-woman, s. A spinner.

"Yea, distaff-women manage rusty bills Against thy seat: both young and old rebel."
Shakespeare: Richard II., iii. 2.

dis-stá-ined, *di-stá-ined, *de-stayned, *di-steigned, *de-steined, *di-stayned, pa. par. or a. [DISTAIN.]

1. Lit.: Stained, discolored.

"Place on their heads that crown distained with gore, Which these dire hands from my slain father tore."
Pope: Thebais of Statius, 113, 114.

2. Fig.: Disgraced, sullied, defamed.

"I live distained, thou undishonored."

Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors, ii. 2.

di-stá-in, *de-stayne, *de-stein, *di-stayne, *dis-teign, *di-steyne, v. t. [O. Fr. desteindre, desteindre; Fr. déteindre; O. Fr. des=Fr. dé=Lat. dis=away, apart, and teindre=to stain, to tinge; Lat. tingo; Sp. desteñir; Port. destinger.] [STAIN, TINGE.]

1. Lit.: To stain or tinge with any color; to discolor.

"A purple stream of blood Distains the surface of the silver flood."

Pope: Homer's Battle of the Frogs and Mice, iii. 47, 48.

II. Figuratively:

1. To stain, to sully, to tarnish.

"His noble blood never destained was."

Skelton: Death of Northumberland.

2. To outdo; to surpass in color.

"Hyde ye youre beauties, Ysande and Eleyne,
My lady cometh, that all this may destayne."

Chaucer: Legend of Good Women, Prolog. 255.

3. To calm, still, or pacify.

dis-tá-in-lág, pr. par., a. & s. [DISTAIN.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of staining, discoloring, or tarnishing.

dis-tál, a. [Formed from Latin disto=to be distant, on a supposed analogy of central.]

1. Anat.: Applied to the extremity of a bone, limb, or organ furthest removed from the point of attachment or insertion; situated at the furthest point from the center.

"Momentary mechanic or electric excitation of the distal extremity of the divided sciatic nerve causes temporary contraction of all the glands of the hind feet [of a frog]."—Academy, April 15, 1871, p. 229.

2. Bot.: Applied to the extremity of an organ furthest removed from the point of attachment or insertion.

3. Zool.: Applied to the quickly growing end of the hydrosoma of a Hydrozoön; the opposite or proximal extremity growing less rapidly, and being the end by which the organism is fixed, when attached at all.

"The solid axis is also almost invariably prolonged beyond the opposite or distal end of the polypary as a naked rod."—Nicholson: Paleontology, p. 84.

dis-tál-ly, adv. [Eng. distal; -ly.] At or toward the distal or furthest end; at the extremity.

"Distally the inner and outer condylar tuberosities are almost wanting."—Trans. Amer. Philosoph. Soc. (1873), vol. xiii., p. 203.

dis-tance, *des-tance, *des-taunce, *dis-taunce, *dis-tawns, *dys-tans, *dys-tawns, s. [Fr. distance; Sp. & Port. distancia; Ital. distanza, from Lat. distantia, from distans, pr. par. of disto=to be apart or distant.]

A. Ordinary Language:

1. Of material objects:

(1) Literally:

(1) The space, length, or interval between two objects, measured along the shortest line or course between them.

"Gravity increases as the squares of the distances decrease."—Herschel: Astronomy (5th ed.), § 531.

(2) The quality of being distant or remote; remoteness.

"'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view."

Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, i. 7.

(3) In the same sense as B. 6.

2. Figuratively (of material bodies separated by difference of opinion, feelings, tastes, &c.):

(1) A disagreement, a discussion, alienation.

"When the Emperor . . . saw swiche a distance amonge the systeres."—Gesta Romanorum (ed. Herrtage), p. 134.

(2) Respect; as shown in behavior by not approaching too close.

"Tis by respect and distance that authority is upheld."

Atterbury.

(3) Reserve; coolness; as shown in behavior by the avoiding of the society of any person.

"All his distance was at once abandoned."—Lever: Dodd Family Abroad, lxviii.

II. Of immaterial things:

1. Of time, &c.:

(1) Space, length, or interval of time intervening between two events.

"I help my preface by a prescript, to tell that there is ten years' distance between one and the other."—Prior.

(2) Remoteness in time, either past or future.

"We have as much assurance of these things, as things future and at a distance are capable of."—Tillotson.

(3) Remoteness in succession, relation, or descent.

2. Of ideas, &c.: Ideal space or separation.

"The qualities that affect our senses are, in the things themselves, so united and blended, that there is no separation, no distance between them."—Locke.

3. Difference, distinction. (Scotch.)

B. Technically:

1. Art: The extreme boundary of view in a picture; that part which appears the farthest away. In perspective, the point of distance is that point of a picture where the visual rays meet. The middle distance is the central portion of a picture between the foreground and the distance. The line of distance is a straight line drawn from the eye to the principal point in the plane.

2. Fencing: The space or interval kept by two antagonists in fighting.

"We come to see fight; to see thy pass, thy stock, thy reverse, thy distance."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 3.

3. Milit.: The space or interval preserved between men, or bodies of men, measured from front to rear.

4. Mus.: The interval between any two notes.

5. Racing: In races run in heats, a length of 240 yards from the winning-post, marked at the opposite end by the distance-post (q. v.). Any horse which does not succeed in passing the distance-post before the winning horse passes the winning-post, is said to be distanced, and is thereby disqualified from taking further part in the race.

6. Surv.: The distance between two points is the length of a line joining the two points, expressed in terms of some line which is assumed as the unit of length. Distances are distinguished as vertical distances, or heights; horizontal distances, or those estimated in a horizontal plane; and oblique distances, which are neither horizontal nor vertical. Accessible distances are those which may be measured by the direct application of some linear unit of measure; inaccessible distances are those which either cannot be reached, or which are inconvenient to reach, so as to apply to these the linear unit. Such distances are determined by the measurement of angles and trigonometrical rules and formulae.

(1) Angular distance: The angle included between the lines of direction of two bodies from a point. Thus, if a spectator's eye be placed at the point A, and lines drawn from it to the two objects B and C, the angle B A C formed by these two lines is the angular distance of B from C.

(2) Apparent distance: The apparent distance of an object is the distance which we judge an object to be from us when seen from afar off, which may be very different from the real distance.

(3) Curtate distance:

Astron.: [CURTATE.]

(4) Law of distances: [LAW.]

(5) Line of distance: [DISTANCE, s., B. 1.]

(6) Mean distance:

Astron.: A mean between the aphelion and perihelion distances of a planet.

(7) Meridian distance: [MERIDIAN.]

(8) Middle distance: [DISTANCE, s., B. 1.]

(9) Point of distance: [DISTANCE, s., B. 1.]

(10) Proportional distances:

Astron.: The distances of the several planets from the sun, compared with the distance of any one of them considered as a unity.

(11) Real distance: The absolute distance of one body from another, as determined by any terrestrial measure, as miles, yards, &c.

(12) At a distance: With some distance intervening, either of space or time.

"To judge right of blessings prayed for, and yet at a distance."—Smalridge.

(13) From a distance: From a point distant from that looked at or intended.

"The rocks of St. Paul appear from a distance of a brilliant white color."—Darwin: Voyage round the World, ch. i.

(14) To keep one's distance:

(a) To show respect; to behave respectfully.

"If a man makes me keep my distance, the comfort is, he keeps his at the same time."—Swift.

(b) To act or behave with reserve or coolness

(15) To save one's distance:

Racing: To pass the distance-post before the winning horse has passed the winning-post.

"I had nothing whatever to do but to save my distance, to win the race."—Lever: Dodd Family Abroad, xiv.

distance-calculator, s.

General Berdan's distance-calculator, or what would be called such in range-guides, essentially consists of two telescopes, one meter apart. The two telescopes take the angles, and, the base being known, the materials for calculating distances trigonometrically exist. But with a base relatively so minute there is no likelihood of accuracy in the result, for the minutest error in angle will produce a great one in the distance sought to be ascertained.

distance-post, s.

Racing: A post set up at a distance of 240 yards from the winning-post. [DISTANCE, s., B. 5.]

"It was only by dint of incessant spurring . . . that I was able to get inside the distance-post."—Lever: Dodd Family Abroad, xiv.

fäte, fät, färe, amidst, whät, fäll, father; wë, wët, hëre, camel, hër, thëre; plne, pít, síre, sír, marine; gô, pôť, or, wöre, wolf, wörk, whô, sôn; müte, cüb, cüre, unite, cür, rüle, füll; trý, Sýrian, æ, œ = ē; ey = ä. qu = kw.

distance-signal, s.

Rail. Eng.: The most distant of the signals under the control of a signal-man.

dis-tance, v. t. [DISTANCE, s.]A. Ordinary Language:*I. Literally:1. To place, set, or situate at a distance.

"Most pure and piercing the aire of this shire; and none in England hath more plenty of clear and fresh rivulets of water, not to speak of the friendly sea conveniently distanced from London."—Fuller: Worthies, Hampshire.

"To leave behind at a distance; to place a distance between one's self and another."

"Like the swift hind the bounding damsel flies, Strains to the goal; the distanced lover dies."
Gay: The Fan.

II. Figuratively:1. To cause to appear as if at a distance or remote.

"That which gives a relieve to a bowl, is the quick light, or white, which appears to be on the side nearest to us, and the black by consequence distances the object."—Dryden: Dufresnoy's Art of Painting.

"2. To outstrip, to excel, to outdo; to leave far behind in any mental struggle."

"He distanced the most skillful of his contemporaries."
—Milner.

3. To distinguish. (Scotch.)

B. Racing: A horse which does not succeed in passing the distance-post before the first horse passes the winning-post is said to be distanced. [DISTANCE, s., B. 5.]

dis-tanced, pa. par. & a. [DISTANCE.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Placed, set, or situated at a distance; outstripped, excelled.

2. Racing: [DISTANCE, v. B.]

dis-tance-less, a. [Eng. distance; -less.] Not allowing a distant view; dull.

"A silent, dim, distanceless, rotting day in March."—C. Kingsley: Yeast, ch. i. (Davies).

dis-tant-ly, adv. [Eng. distant; -ly.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of leaving behind, outstripping or excelling.

dis-tan-çy, *dis-tan-çle, s. [Lat. distantia.]

A distance.

"By sense things present at a distance."

More: Song of the Soul, pt. iii., bk. ii., § 6.

dis-tant, a. [Fr. distant; Ital. & Sp. distante, from Lat. distans, pr. par. of disto=to stand apart, to be separated: dis=away, apart, and sto=to stand.]

I. Of material things:

1. Separated or divided by an intervening space of any extent.

"One board had two tenons, equally distant one from another."—Exod. xxxvi. 22.

2. Remote, removed, far away.

"Narrowness of mind should be cured by reading histories of past ages, and of nations and countries distant from our own."—Watts: Improvement of the Mind.

II. Of immaterial things:1. Of time: Remote in time past or future.

2. Of succession, descent, &c.: Remote or removed in the line of descent.

3. Of relationship: Not closely connected in consanguinity.

4. Of ideas, thoughts, &c.:

(1) Not obvious or plain; indirect.

"To express everything obscene in modest terms and distant phrases."—Addison: Spectator.

(2) In view or prospect; not likely to be realized; faint, slight.

(3) Slight, faint, not strong or easily recognized; as, a distant resemblance.

5. Of manners, disposition, &c.:

(1) Reserved, shy, cool, not warm or cordial; characterized by coolness, indifference, or disrespect.

(2) Not closely connected or allied; remote in kind or nature.

"What besides this unhappy servility to custom can reconcile men that own Christianity to a practice so widely distant from it?"—Government of the Tongue.

6. Of a sound: Appearing remote, faint; dying away.

"The boy's cry came to her from the field
More and more distant."
Tennyson: Dora, 102, 103.

Crabb thus discriminates between distant, far, and remote: "Distant is employed as an adjunct or otherwise; far is used only as an adverb. We speak of distant objects, or objects being distant; but we speak of things only as being far. Distant is employed only for bodies at rest; far signifies gone or removed away, and is employed for bodies either stationary or otherwise; hence we say that a thing is distant, or it goes, runs, or flies far. Distant is used to designate great space; far only that which is ordinary: the sun is ninety-four millions of miles distant from the earth; one person lives not very far off, or a person is far from the spot. Distant is used absolutely to express an intervening space; remote rather expresses the relative idea of being gone out of sight. A person is said to live in a distant country or in a remote corner of any country. They bear a similar analogy in the figurative application; when we speak of a remote idea it designates that which is less liable to strike the mind than a distant idea. A distant relationship between individuals is never altogether lost sight of; when the connection between objects is very remote it easily escapes observation." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dis-tan-ti-al (ti as shi), *dis-tan-ci-al, a. [Formed as if from a Lat. distantialis, from distantia.] Distant, remote, removed.

"His liver diseased and corrupted by distillation."—Holland: Suetonius, p. 74.

II. Chemistry:

1. The act of heating a solid or liquid in a vessel so constructed that the vapors thrown off from the heated substance are collected and condensed. Every distilling apparatus consists essentially of a retort or boiler, in which vaporization takes place, a refrigerator in which the vapor is condensed, and a receiver. Distillation is of great value in the arts and manufactures. Pure or distilled water, so indispensable to the chemist, is obtained by distillation; sea-water can be rendered potable by the same process; while volatile oils and essences are extracted from plants by distillation with water or alcohol. Its most extensive application is in the manufacture of intoxicating spirits. A wort or saccharine infusion is prepared from malt or other grain, or from sugar, at a temperature not exceeding 160° F. After being separated from the grain and cooled to between 60° and 70° F., a certain quantity of yeast is added. Fermentation at once begins, and the saccharine matter is resolved into alcohol and carbonic acid, the former of which remains in the liquid. As soon as the liquor ceases to ferment, the alcoholic mixture, which is now called wash, is run into the still and submitted to distillation. When a strong, flavorless spirit is required, a large and peculiarly constructed still, with high condensing power, is used; but a flavored spirit is obtained by a double distillation in a small still with low condensing power. The product of the first distillation is called "low wines." A re-distillation at a lower temperature produces first an oil which is separated, and then a spirit more or less flavored. Malt liquor is impregnated with the essential oil of barley brandy with the oil of the grape; rum with the oil of the sugar-cane; and gin with the oil of juniper, &c. [FUSEL OIL.]

† (1) Dry distillation is a term applied to the distillation of a solid substance, as in the preparation and purification of zinc.

(2) Fractional distillation is the separation of liquids having different boiling points. In distillation proper, a simple mechanical separation takes place.

(3) Destructive distillation: The kind of distillation produced when the temperature is raised sufficiently high to decompose the substance, and evolve new products, possessing different qualities. It is exemplified in the production of wood-naphtha, pyroligneous acid, and tar, by the distillation of wood in close vessels at a high temperature.

2. The product of the process of distillation; the substance drawn by the still, and found in the receiver of the distilling apparatus.

"I suffered the pangs of three several deaths; . . . hen to be stopped in, like a strong distillation, with stinking clothes."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, iii. 5.

† Distillation, and the various processes dependent on it, are believed to have been introduced into Europe by the Moors about A. D. 1150. The distillation of spirituous liquors was in practice in Great Britain in the sixteenth century. (Haydn.)

distill-house, distil-house, s. A distillery.

"Schiedam . . . containing near three hundred distill-houses."—Pocket Magazine (1794), vol. i., p. 22.

dis-till-la-tör-y, dis-till-la-tor-ie, a. & s. [Fr. distillatoire, Ital. distillatorio, Sp. destilatorio, from Lat. distillatus, pa. par. of distillo.] [STILLA-TORY.]

*A. As adj.: Pertaining to, or used in the process of distillation.

"Having in well-closed distillatory glasses caught the fumes."—Boyle: Works, i. 136.

B. As substantive:

*1. Chem.: An apparatus used in distilling; a still.
2. Her.: A charge borne by the Distillers' Company, and usually blazoned: "a distillatory double armed, on a fire, with two worms and bolt receivers." (Ogilvie.)

"Thanne must ye do make in the furnes of aischin a distillatorie of glas."—Book of Quinte-Essence, p. 4.

dis-till led, pa. par. & a. [DISTILL.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adj.: Obtained by distillation; purified, perfumed.

"Balm his foul head in warm distilled waters."

Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew (Induct. i.).

distilled-water, s.

Chem.: Pure water obtained by distillation, H₂O. The water, if it contains suspended impurities, should be first filtered. The soluble impurities are either volatile or fixed. Of the water which comes over first about one-tenth should be rejected, as it contains nearly all the volatile impurities. The worm should be of block tin, silver, or platinum, as steam acts on glass, dissolving out alkaline silicates. Care should be taken to prevent the mechanical spitting of the liquid; one-tenth of the water should be left in the retort; the solid impurities are also left. It should be redistilled to get rid of traces of organic matter, after it has been treated with a little caustic potash and permanganate of potassium, to oxidize the organic impurities. If it still contains traces of ammonia it should be again redistilled over KHSO₄ to fix the ammonia. Distilled water is used in chemical analysis, and ought always to be used in preparing medicines. It should give no precipitate with AgNO₃, showing the absence of chlorides; nor with ammonia oxalate, showing the absence of lime; nor with barium chloride, BaCl₂, showing the absence of sulphuric acid. A drop of permanganate of potassium should give a pink tint to the water, showing the absence of organic matter.

dis-till-lër, s. [Eng. distill; -er.] Specifically, one whose business is the production of spirits by distillation.

"Our copious granaries distillers thin."

Watson: Oxford Newsmen's Verses (1767).

dis-till-lër-y, s. [Fr. distillerie.]

*1. The act or process of distillation.

2. A place or building where distillation is carried on.

"The site is now occupied by a distillery."—Pennant: London, p. 41.

dis-till-lîng, pr. par., a. & s. [DISTILL.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Dropping, falling in drops.

2. Chem.: Used or adapted for distillation.

"A distilling apparatus for the supply of fresh water."—London Times.

C. As subst.: The act or process of distillation.

dis-till-mënt, dis-till-mënt, s. [Eng. distill; -ment.] That which is extracted by distillation; a distillate.

"Upon my secure hour thy uncle stole,
And in the porches of mine ears did pour
The leperous distillment."

Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 5.

dis-tîñct, a., adv. & s. [Fr., from Lat. distinctus, pa. par. of distinguo=to distinguish (q. v.); Ital. & Sp. distinto.]

A. As adjective:

*dis-tīnct', *dis-tīncte, v. t. [O. Fr. distincter, from Lat. distinctus.]

1. To distinguish.

"There can no wight distinct it so,
That he dare saie a word thereto."
Rosaunt of the Rose, 6, 199, 6, 200.

2. To mark out, to define.

"In the which year [1288] died Stephen Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury, by whom the chapters of the Bible, in that order and number as we now use them, were first distincted."—Fox: Martyrs, p. 248.

*dis-tīnct'-i-ty, v. t. [Eng. distinct; i connective, and suff. -ty.] To make distinct.

"Both distinctly and magnify its feeblest component members."—Proctor: Myths and Marvels of Astronomy, p. 247.

dis-tīnct'-i-on, *dis-tīnct-ion, *dis-tīnct-ion, s. [Lat. distinctio=a marking out, distinction; Fr. distinction; Sp. distincion; Ital. distinzione, from Lat. distinctus, pa. par. of distingo.]

*1. The act of distinguishing, dividing, or marking off.

"The distinction of tragedy into acts was not known; or, if it were, it is yet so darkly delivered to us, that we cannot make it out."—Dryden: Essay on Dramatic Poesy.

*2. A dividing, separating, or keeping apart.

"For distinctious of dyuers manere men that woned there."—Trevisa, i. 111.

*3. A division, a branch.

"I thisse distinction beoth af cheapitres."—Aenebite, p. 12.

4. The act of distinguishing or discriminating between.

"This fierce abridgment Hath to it circumstantial branches, which Distinction should be rich in."
Shakesp.: Cymbeline, v. 5.

*5. Discernment, judgment, discrimination; the power of distinguishing.

"She left the eye distinction to call out
The one from the other."
Beaumont & Fletcher.

6. That which serves to distinguish one thing from others; a mark or note of difference.

"None can venture to fix the precise moment at which either distinction ceased."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. i.

7. A distinguishing quality, property, or characteristic.

"The streams are lost amid the splendid blank, O'erwhelming all distinction."
Cooper: Task, v. 96, 97.

8. Difference regarded; regard to circumstances, qualities, or characteristics; discrimination.

"There is no distinction of Jew and of Greek, for the same Lord of all is rich in all that ynnardi clopen hem."—Wyclif: Romans x.

9. A difference made or drawn between things.

"... but the distinctions rest upon unsupported conjectures."—Lewis: Cred. Early Rom. Hist. (1855), ch. xiii., pt. ii., § 22.

10. Eminence, superiority; elevation in rank or character; honor, estimation.

"Among philosophers... merit only makes distinction."—Goldsmith: On Poetic Learning, ch. xiii.

11. That which confers eminence or superiority, as a high office or honor bestowed.

"He had been elected speaker in the late reign under circumstances which made that distinction peculiarly honorable."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. iv.

12. Honor, credit.

"Without distinction: Promiscuously, alike, indiscriminately; without regard to differences existing."

* For the difference between distinction and difference, see DIFFERENCE.

dis-tīnct'-ive, a. [Fr. distinctif; Ital. & Sp. distintivo.]

1. Serving to mark distinction or difference.

"The Holy One is a distinctive title of God."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 34.

*2. Having the power to distinguish or discriminate; discriminating.

"Credulous and vulgar auditors readily believe it, and the more judicious and distinctive heads do not reject it."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

3. Distinguished, separate, distinct.

"All carpet patterns should be constructed as distinctive from wall patterns."—Dr. Dresser, in Cassell's Technical Educator, pt. ii., p. 248.

*dis-tīnct'-ive-ly, adv. [Eng. distinctive; -ly.]

1. With proper distinction or difference.

"Her sweet tongue could speak distinctively Greek, Latin, Tuscano, Spanish, French, and Dutch."—Mirror for Magistrates, p. 855.

2. Plainly, without confusion, accurately.

"To what end doth he distinctively assign a peculiar dispensation of operations to the Father, of ministries to the Son, of gifts to the Holy Ghost?"—Barrow: Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 26.

dis-tīnct'-ly, adv. [Eng. distinct; -ly.]

1. In a distinct manner; with distinction, not confusedly.

"I do not in position distinctly speak of her."
Shakesp.: Othello, iii. 3.

*6. With discrimination or meaning; significantly.

"Thou dost snore distinctly:
There's meaning in thy snores."
Shakesp.: Tempest, ii. 1.

* For the difference between distinct and clearly, see CLEARLY.

dis-tīnct'-ness, s. [Eng. distinct; -ness.]

1. The quality of being distinct or separate.

"Its incorporeity or distinctness from the body."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 37.

2. Such separation or difference between things as makes them easily distinguishable.

3. Clearness or plainness of sound.

4. Clearness, precision, exactness.

"In order to write with precision, one must possess a very considerable degree of distinctness and accuracy."—Blair, vol. i., lect. 10.

*5. Discrimination, judgment, discernment; the power of discriminating or distinguishing between things.

"The membranes and humors of the eye are perfectly pellucid, and void of color, for the clearness, and for the distinctness, of vision."—Ray: On the Creation.

*dis-tīnct'-ōr, s. [Lat.] One who distinguishes or makes distinctions.

"Such curious distinctors."—Holinshed: Descr. of Ireland, ch. i.

*dis-tīnct'-ūre, s. [Eng. distinct; -ure.] Distinctness.*dis-tīn'-gued (gued as gwēd), *distingwed, a. [Fr. distinguer=to distinguish.] Distinguished.

"Art thou distingwed and embelised by the sprynging floures of the first somer season?"—Chaucer: Boethius, p. 47.

dis-tīn'-guish (gu as gw), v. t. & i. [Fr. distinguer; Sp. & Port. distinguir; Ital. distinguere, from Lat. distinguo=to mark with a prick, to distinguish; dis=away, apart, and a form stinguo (not found)=to prick; cogn. with Eng. sting and stigma (q. v.).]

A. Transitive:

1. To make distinct, or indicate difference by an external mark.

2. To separate from others by some distinctive characteristic; to constitute a mark of difference or distinction in things.

3. To classify or arrange according to different or distinctive properties, characteristics or qualities.

"Moses distinguishes the causes of the flood into those that belong to the heavens, and those that belong to the earth: the rains and the abyss."—Burnet: Theory of the Earth.

4. To note or perceive the distinction or difference between different things; to recognize the individuality of; to discriminate between.

(1) By the senses.

"Being set before you both together,
A judging sight doth soon distinguish either."
Drayton: Matilda to K. John.

(2) By the understanding or reason.

"By our reason we are enabled to distinguish good from evil."—Watts: Logic.

5. To perceive the existence of with the senses; as, To distinguish a sound.

*6. To discern critically; to judge.

"No more can you distinguish of a man, Than of his outward show!"
Shakesp.: Richard III., iii. 1.

*7. To understand.

"No man could distinguish what he said."
Shakesp.: Rape of Lucrece, 1, 786.

8. To make eminent, noted, or known; to gain distinction for.

"In all the four characters he had distinguished himself."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv., p. 457.

B. Intransitive:

1. To make a distinction; to discriminate; to mark or note the distinction or difference.

"The reader must learn to distinguish."—Herschel: Astronomy (1858), § 252.

*2. To become distinct, distinguishable, or differentiated.

"The little embryo first distinguishes into a little knot."—Jer. Taylor.

* (1) Blair thus discriminates between the two words to distinguish and to separate: "We distinguish what we want not to confound with another thing; we separate what we want to remove from it. Objects are distinguished from one another by their qualities; they are separated by the distance or time or place." (Blair: Lect. on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres (1817), vol. i., p. 229.)

(2) Crabb thus discriminates between to distinguish and to discriminate: "To distinguish is the general, to discriminate is the particular term: the former is an indefinite, the latter a definite action. To discriminate is in fact to distinguish specifically; hence we speak of a distinction as true or false, but of a discrimination as nice. We distinguish things as to their divisibility or unity; we discriminate them as to their inherent properties: we distinguish things that are like or unlike, to separate or collect them for the purpose of separating one from the other; we distinguish by means of the senses as well as the understanding; we discriminate by the understanding only: we distinguish things by their color, or we distinguish moral objects by their truth or falsehood; we discriminate the characters of men, or we discriminate their merits according to circumstances." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

* For the difference between to distinguish and to perceive, see PERCEIVE; for that between to distinguish and to signalize, see SIGNALIZE.

dis-tīn'-guish-a-ble (gu as gw), a. [Eng. distinguish; -able.]

1. That may or can be distinguished or discriminated from others; capable of being distinguished.

"Left a race behind
Like to themselves, distinguishable scarce
From Gentiles."—Milton: P. R., iii. 423-25.

2. Capable of being perceived by the senses; perceptible.

"Things that move so swift as not to affect the senses distinctly with several distinguishable distances of their motion."—Locke: Human Understanding, bk. ii., ch. xiv.

*3. Worthy of note or of regard; distinguished, notable.

"I would endeavor that my betters should seek me by the merit of something distinguishable."—Swift.

*dis-tīn'-guish-a-ble-ness (gu as gw), s. [Eng. distinguishable; -ness.] The quality or state of being distinguishable.*dis-tīn'-guish-a-bly (gu as gw), adv. [Eng. distinguishable (le); -ly.] In a manner or degree capable of being distinguished or discriminated from others; distinctly, notably.

"Distinguishably in the taste of the most admired reflections of some of our favorite authors."—Cambridge: The Scribleriad, bk. iv.

dis-tīn'-guished (gu as gw), pa. par. & a. [DISTINGUISH.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Marked by some distinctive or distinguishing sign or property.

"That instant Pallas, bursting from a cloud, Fixed a distinguished mark, and cried aloud."
Pope: Homer's Odyssey, viii. 219, 220.

2. Exceeding or surpassing others; unusual, above the common.

"For sins committed with many aggravations of guilt, the furnace of wrath will be seven times hotter, and burn with a distinguished fury."—Rogers.

3. Eminent, noted, or celebrated for some superior or extraordinary quality.

"They could far more easily bear the preëminence of a distinguished stranger."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

*4. Marked, noticeable.

"Mrs. Delville received her with the most distinguished politeness."—Miss Burney: Cecilia, bk. iii., ch. vii.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sire, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ, sȳrian. æ, æ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

† Crabb thus discriminates between distinguished, conspicuous, eminent, noted, and illustrious: "The idea of an object having something attached to it to excite notice is common to all these terms. Distinguished in its general sense expresses little more than this idea; the rest are but modes of distinguished. A thing is distinguished in proportion as it is distinct or separate from others; it is conspicuous in proportion as it is easily seen; it is noted in proportion as it is widely known. In this sense a rank is distinguished; a situation is conspicuous; a place is noted. Persons are distinguished by external marks or by characteristic qualities; persons or things are conspicuous mostly from some external mark; persons or things are noted mostly by collateral circumstances. A man may be distinguished by his decorations, or he may be distinguished by his manly air, or by his abilities; a person is conspicuous by the gaudiness of his dress; a house is conspicuous that stands on a hill; a person is noted for having performed a wonderful cure; a place is noted for its fine waters. We may be distinguished for things good, bad, or indifferent: we may be conspicuous for our singularities or that which only attracts vulgar notice: we may be noted for that which is bad, and mostly for that which is the subject of vulgar discourse; we can be eminent and illustrious only for that which is really good and praiseworthy; the former applies, however, mostly to those things which set a man high in the circle of his acquaintance; the latter to that which makes him shine before the world. A man of distinguished talent will be apt to excite envy if he be not also distinguished for his private virtue; affectation is never better pleased than when it can place itself in such a conspicuous situation as to draw all eyes upon itself: lovers of fame are sometimes contented to render themselves noted for their vices or absurdities: nothing is more gratifying to a man than to render himself eminent for his professional skill: it is the lot of but few to be illustrious, and those few are very seldom to be envied. In an extended and moral application, these terms may be employed to heighten the character of an object; a favor may be said to be distinguished, piety eminent, and a name illustrious." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

*dis-tin-guished-ly (gu as gw), adv. [Eng. distinguished; -ly.] In a distinguished manner; eminently.

dis-tin-guish-ër (gu as gw), s. [Eng. distinguish; -ër.]

1. One who distinguishes or separates one thing from another by marks of difference.

"Let us admire the wisdom of God in this distinguisher of times, and visible deity, the sun."—Browne: Vulgar Errors.

2. One who accurately discerns the difference or discriminates between things; a critical observer.

"If I should ask any, the most subtil distinguisher."—Hobbes: Answer to Dr. Bramhall.

dis-tin-guish-ing (gu as gw), pr. par., a. & s. [Distinguish.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

"A provision distinguishingly calculated for the same purpose of levitation."—Paley: Natural Theology, ch. xii.

*dis-tin-guish-mënt (gu as gw), s. A distinction; an observation of difference.

"Should a like language use to all degrees, And mannerly distinguishment leave out Betwixt the prince and beggar."—Shakesp.: Winter's Tale, ii. 1.

*dis-ti-tle, v. t. [Pref. dis, and Eng. title (q. v.).] To strip or divest of a title.

"That were the next way to distitle myself of honor."—Ben Jonson: Cynthia's Revels, iv. 2.

*dis-ti-tled (tled as teld), pa. par. or a. [Distitle.]

*dis-ti-tling, pr. par., a. & s. [Distitle.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of divesting of a title.

dis-töm-a, s. [Gr. di=dis=twice, twofold, and stoma=a mouth.]

Zoology:

1. A genus of internal parasitic worms, order Trematoda, class Platyelmintha, vulgarly known as "Suctorial Worms" or "Flukes." The Distoma is commonly found in the liver and biliary ducts of sheep and other ruminants, deriving nourishment from the fluids in which it is immersed, and giving rise to the disease known as the "rot." The body of the creature, which is not quite an inch in length, is flattened, and resembles in some degree a minute sole or flat-fish; at its anterior extremity is a circular disc, or sucker, which is perforated by the aperture of the mouth; while a second sucker of similar form, but imperforate, is placed upon the ventral surface of the body. With these, both formerly thought to be mouths, whence the name, the parasite clings firmly to the body of its host.

The embryo on its discharge from the egg is of conical form and aquatic habits, swimming freely by means of cilia, with which it is covered. These, however, it does not retain long, and passing into its second stage of development, it enters the body of some fresh-water mollusk, where it remains until its temporary host is accidentally taken into the system of some ruminant, when it undergoes its final transformation and passes into its mature stage of development. Distoma has occasionally been found in man.

2. A genus of Mollusca, order Tunicata, family Botryllidae. They occur on marine Algae. Branchial and anal orifices six-rayed.

dis-töm-i-dæ, s. [Mod. Lat. distoma (a) (q. v.), and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of Trematoda, type Distoma.

*dis-tor-que-mënt (que as k), s. [Lat. distorqueo=to twist, to distort.] A distortion, a writhing.

"Like the distorquements of a darted conscience."—Feltham: Resolves.

dis-tort, v. t. [Fr. détorquer, détordre; Sp. & Port. detorcer; Ital. distorcere.] [DISTORT, a.]

I. Literally:

1. To twist, bend, or put out of the natural figure or posture; to deform, to disfigure.

"And there lay the rider distorted and pale, With the dew on his brow and the rust on his mail."—Byron: Destruction of Sennacherib.

2. To represent in a distorted form: as, His features were distorted in the mirror.

II. Figuratively:

1. To force out of the true course or direction; to pervert, to bias, to prejudice.

"Once they loomed dimly through an obscuring and distorting haze of prejudice."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

2. To turn or twist from the true meaning; to wrest, to pervert.

"The words of Mr. Hooker, thus pitifully distorted."—Hammond: Works, vol. ii., pt. ii., p. 51.

† For the difference between to distort and to turn, see TURN.

*dis-tort, a. [Lat. distortus, pa. par. of distorqueo=to twist aside: dis=away, apart; torqueo=to twist.] Distorted.

"Her face was ugly, and her mouth distorted."—Spenser: F. Q., v. xii. 36.

dis-tort-ëd, pa. par. & a. [DISTORT, v.]

1. Lit.: Twisted, turned, or bent from the natural course or figure.

"Seated here On thy distorted root, with hearers none."—Couper: Yardley Oak.

*dis-tort-ëd-ly, adv. [Eng. distorted; -ly.] In a distorted or perverted manner; by perversion.

"They so violently and distortedly pervert the natural order of things."—Cudworth: Morality, bk. iv., ch. iv.

dis-tort-ër, s. [Eng. distort; -ër.] One who or that which distorts.

dis-tort-ing, pr. par., a. & s. [DISTORT, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of twisting or turning out of the natural figure; distortion.

dis-tor-tion, s. [Lat. distortio, from distortus, pa. par. of distorqueo.]

3. That which causes suffering, pain, or anguish; a calamity, a misfortune.

"He saved them out of their distresses."—Ps. cvii. 13.

4. In the same sense as II.

5. A state of danger or need of assistance.

"These signal stations are to be available to give notice of vessels in distress and requiring assistance."—London Daily Telegraph.

II. Law:

1. English and American:

(1) The act of distraining or seizing the personal chattels of any person in order to satisfy a demand or to enforce a duty.

(a) A distress is the taking of a personal chattel out of the possession of the wrongdoer into the custody of the party injured, to procure a satisfaction for the wrong committed, the most usual injury for which a distress may be taken being non-payment of rent. A distress may also be taken where a man finds beasts of a stranger wandering in his grounds, damage-feasant: that is, doing him hurt or damage, by treading down his grass, or the like. . . . As a general rule, all chattels personal found upon the premises, whether they in fact belong to the tenant or a stranger, are distrainable for rent. To this rule there are certain exceptions; as, for instance, the tools and utensils of trade, if in actual use; valuable things intrusted in the way of trade, as a horse standing in a smith's shop to be shod; goods intrusted to a common carrier, auctioneer, or agent; things fixed to the freehold, as windows, doors, &c.; and nothing which cannot be rendered again in as good plight as when it was distrainted, as milk, fruit, and the like. All distresses must be made by day, unless in the case of damage-feasant; nor must the value of the chattels distrainted be excessive in proportion to the debt.

(b) Infinite distress is one which may be repeated from time to time, until the stubbornness of the party is conquered, as in cases of neglect of fealty, or to do suit of court, or to appear as a juror. (Blackstone: Comment.)

(2) The chattels distrainted.

"And the distress thus taken must be proportioned to the thing distrainted for, for otherwise he incurs the risk of an action for taking an excessive distress."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iii., ch. 1.

2. Scots Law: A pledge or security taken by the sheriffs for the good behavior of those who came to fairs. It was returned to them at the end of the fair or market if no harm had been done.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between distress, anxiety, anguish, and agony: "Distress is the pain felt when in a strait from which we see no means of extricating ourselves; anxiety is that pain which one feels on the prospect of an evil. The distress always depends upon some outward cause; the anxiety often lies in the imagination. The distress is produced by the present, but not always immediate evil; the anxiety respects that which is future: anguish arises from the reflection on the evil that is past; agony springs from witnessing that which is immediate or before the eye. Distress is not peculiar to any age; where there is a consciousness of good and evil, pain and pleasure, distress will inevitably exist from some circumstance or another. Anxiety, anguish, and agony belong to riper years; infancy and childhood are deemed the happy periods of human existence, because they are exempt from the anxieties attendant on every one who has a station to fill and duties to discharge. Anxiety and agony are species of distress, of the severer kind, which spring altogether from the maturity of reflection and the full consciousness of evil. A child is in distress when it loses its mother, and the mother is also in distress when she misses her child. The station of a parent is, indeed, that which is most productive, not only of distress, but anxiety, anguish, and agony: the mother has her peculiar anxieties for the child, while rearing it in its infant state; the father has his anxiety for its welfare on its entrance into the world; they both suffer the deepest anguish when the child disappoints their dearest hopes, by running a career of vice, and finishing its wicked course by an untimely, and sometimes ignominious end: not unfrequently they are doomed to suffer the agony of seeing a child encircled in flames from which he cannot be snatched, or sinking into a watery grave from which he cannot be rescued." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dis-tréss, v. t. [DISTRÉSS, s.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To cause distress, pain, anxiety, or agony to; to harass, to afflict, to grieve greatly, to pain.

"I am distréssed for thee, my brother Jonathan."—2 Sam. i. 26.

2. To force, compel, or constrain by pain or suffering.

"Men who can neither be distréssed nor won into a sacrifice of duty."—Hamilton.

3. To exhaust, to tire out: as, His horse was greatly distréssed.

II. Law: To distraint.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between distress, to harass, and to perplex: "A person is distréssed either in his outward circumstances or his feelings; he is harassed mentally or corporeally; he is perplexed in his understanding more than in his feelings: a deprivation distresses; provocations and hostile measures harass; stratagems and ambiguous measures perplex. A besieged town is distréssed by the cutting off its resources of water and provisions; the besieged are harassed by perpetual attacks; the besiegers are perplexed in all their maneuvers and plans by the counter maneuver."

fâte, fât, färe, amidst, whât, fáll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, there; plne, plt, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pôť, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mâte, cûb, cûre, unite, cûr, rôle, fûll; trÿ, sÿrian. æ, œ = é; oy = à. qu = kw.

and contrivances of their opponents: a tale of woe distresses; continual alarms and incessant labor harass; unexpected obstacles and inextricable difficulties perplex. We are distressed and perplexed by circumstances; we are harassed altogether by persons or the intentional efforts of others; we may relieve another in distress or may remove a perplexity, but the harassing ceases only with the cause which gave rise to it." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

dis-tréssed', *dis-trést', pa. par. or a. [DISTRESS, v.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

dis-trib-ú-tá-ble, a. [Eng. distribut(e); -able.]

That may or can be distributed or dealt out; capable of distribution.

"To make my patrimony distributable among a great number."—Str W. Jones: Fragments of Isaus.

dis-trib-ú-tár-ý, a. & s. [Eng. distribut(e); -ary.]

A. As adj.: Serving to distribute; distributing.

B. As subst.: A means, line, or passage of distribution.

"Breaking up into distributaries as it approaches the sea."—London Times.

dis-trib-ú-te, v. t. & i. [Lat. distributus, pa. par. of distribuo=to distribute; dis=away, apart, and tribuo=to share; Sp. & Port. distribuir; Ital. distribuire; Fr. distribuer.]

A. Transitive:

1. Ordinary Language:

To divide or deal out among a number; to give or bestow in portions; to share.

"His bribes, distributed with judicious prodigality, speedily produced a large return."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng. ch. xviii.

2. To dispense, to deal out, to administer.

"Not in the presence
Of dreaded justice, but of the ministers
That do distribute it."

Shakespeare: Coriolanus, iii. 3.

3. To assign or appoint to different positions or stations.

"The Levites, whom David had distributed in the house of the Lord."—2 Chron. xiii. 18.

4. To divide, separate or arrange, as into classes, divisions, genera, &c.; to classify.

5. To spread, to scatter, to disperse.

"The greater number of families [of plants] is distributed over the whole globe."—Balfour: Botany, § 1146.

II. Technically:

1. Logic: To employ a term in its fullest extent. [DISTRIBUTE.]

"Universal judgments distribute, i. e., introduce the whole of their subject; particulars do not. In 'All the fixed stars twinkle,' and 'No man is wise at all times,' it is obvious that we are speaking of the whole of the fixed stars, and of men, respectively; and therefore each term is distributed."—Thomson: Laws of Thought, § 71.

2. Print.: To separate and return the type from the column to the case.

B. Intransitive:

1. To share, to deal out.

"He distributed to the disciples."—John vi. 11.

2. Specif.: To dispense charity.

"Distributing to the necessity of the saints."—Romans xii. 13.

3. To assign, to allot, to dispense.

"As God hath distributed to every man."—1 Cor. vii. 17.

¶ For the difference between distribute and to dispense, see DISPENSE; for that between distribute and to divide, see DIVIDE.

dis-trib-ú-téd, pa. par. or a. [DISTRIBUTE.]

A. As pa. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Shared, divided, assigned, or dealt out.

II. Technically:

1. Logic: Applied to a term used in its fullest extent, so as to include all significations or applications.

2. Print.: Applied to type returned from the column to the case.

dis-trib-ú-tér, s. [Eng. distribut(e); -er.] One who distributes, deals out, or shares anything; a dispenser, a divider, an administrator.

"There were judges and distributors of justice appointed for the several parts of his dominions."—Addison: On Italy.

dis-trib-ú-tíng, pr. par., a. & s. [DISTRIBUTE.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: The act of dealing out, assigning, dispensing, or administering; distribution, division.

2. Print.: The operation of returning from the column to the case the letters, &c., which make up the matter. The compositor wets a page or part of a column of matter, and takes up a number of lines on his distributing-rule. The wetting causes the types to adhere slightly together. He takes a few words between his finger and thumb, and, reading the purport, by a dexterous slackening of his grip, so as to loosen the type seriatim, he throws the several letters into their various boxes. Distribution is said to be four times faster than composition. (Knight.) [TYPE-DISTRIBUTING MACHINE.]

distributing-reservoir, s. A small reservoir for a given district, capable of containing a volume of water equal to the whole excess of the demand for water during those hours of the day when such demand exceeds the average rate, above a supply during the same time at the average rate. The greatest hourly demand for water is about double the average hourly demand. The least that a distributing-reservoir should hold is half the daily demand. (Knight.) distributing-roller, s.

Print.: A roller on the edge of an inking-table for distributing ink to the printing-roller. At the side of the table is an ink-trough, or fountain, which is pressed up against the distributing-roller by balance-weights. The distributing-roller presents a supply of ink to the printing-roller, which is then run backward and forward on the table to spread the ink evenly around it. The arrangement was invented by Professor Cowper, and is described in his English patent of 1813. The distributing-roller in printing-machines carries ink from the ductor-roller to the inking-roller. To secure an even distribution, it is found necessary to give a vibratory as well as a revolving motion to the roller. (Knight.) distributing-rule, s.

distributing-table, s.

Print.: The slab on which the ink is spread and transferred to the rollers. (Knight.)

dis-trib-ú-tion, s. [Lat. distributio, from distributus, pa. par. of distribuo=to distribute; Fr. distribution; Ital. distribuzione; Sp. distribucion.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of distributing, dividing, or dealing out to others.

"Ample was the boon
He gave them, in its distribution fair."

Cowper: Task, v. 199, 200.

2. The act of giving in charity; a dispensing of alms.

"They glorify God for your professed subjection unto the gospel of Christ, and for your liberal distribution unto them."—2 Cor. ix. 13.

3. The dispensing or administering of justice.

4. An assigning, appointing, or allotting to different stations or positions.

5. The act of dividing, arranging, or separating, into classes, genera, &c.

6. The act of dispersing or spreading abroad.

"By the distribution of his light."

Blackmore: Creation, bk. ii.

7. The state of being dispersed, spread, or scattered.

8. That which is distributed, or dealt out.

"Let us govern our charitable distributions by this pattern of nature, and maintain a mutual circulation of benefits and returns."—Atterbury.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: The disposition and arrangement of the several parts of a building according to the rules of art.

2. Law: The distributing of the personal estate of intestates.

3. Logic: The distinguishing of an universal whole into its several kinds of species. [DISTRIBUTE, II. 1.]

4. Nat. Hist.: The manner, degree, and extent in which the flora and fauna of the world are distributed over the surface of the earth, with the variations in certain areas, and the causes or conditions which cause such variations.

"It has reference to the distribution of plants in an altitudinal or hypsometrical point of view."—Balfour: Botany, § 1188.

5. Print.: The act of distributing type. [DISTRIBUTE, s. 2.]

6. Rhet.: A division and enumeration of the several qualities of a subject.

7. Steam Eng.: The application of steam in the engine in respect to its induction, eduction, expansive workings, &c.

¶ (1) Distribution of animals:

Zool. & Geol.: The diffusion of animals in space and in time. To these, in the case of marine animals, diffusion in depth.

(a) Zool.: The diffusion of animals in space; there are zoological provinces, regions, &c.; but to render these precise it is requisite to make them vary in some cases for each sub-kingdom, and in some even for each class. For instance, the geographical distribution of wingless mammals is not the same as that of winged birds, nor is it the same as that of fishes. The following, according to Woodward, is the distribution of the mollusca through the several provinces which they inhabit:

(i.) Marine Provinces:

Arctic, Boreal, Celtic, Lusitanian, Aralo-Caspian, West African, South African, Indo-Pacific, Australo-Zealandic, Japonic, Aleutic, Californian, Panamic, Peruvian, Magellanic, Patagonian, Caribbean, and Trans-Atlantic.

(ii.) Land Regions:

Germanic, Lusitanian, Africa, Cape, Yemen-Madagascar, Indian, China and Japan, Philippine Islands, Java, Borneo, Papua and New Ireland, Australian, South Australia and Tasmania, New Zealand, Polynesian, Canadian, Atlantic States, American, Oregon and Californian, Mexican, Antilles, Columbian, Brazilian, Peruvian, Argentine, Chilean, and Patagonian.

In the case of marine animals inquiry must be made also as to their bathymetrical distribution—i. e., the limits of depth in the sea within which any particular marine animal lives. With regard to the former, four zones have for some considerable time been recognized—the Littoral Zone, between tide-marks; the Laminarian one, from low-water mark to 15 fathoms deep; the Coralline Zone, from 15 to 50 fathoms; and the Deep-sea Coral Zone, from 50 to 100 fathoms. To these Nicholson adds a fifth, which he calls the Abyssal Zone, from 100 to 3,000 or 4,000 fathoms.

(b) Geol.: The diffusion of animals in time. The same laws obtain as in plants. For details see the various paleontological articles.

(2) Distribution of electricity:

Elect.: The manner in which electricity is distributed. Various experiments show that electricity does not penetrate into the interior of bodies, but is confined to their surface. Its distribution does not, therefore, depend upon the mass of a body, but upon the extent of its surface.

ból, bôy; pòut, jôw; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; -cian, -tian = shàn. -tion, -sion = shün; sin, ag; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, dəl.

(3) Distribution of magnetism, Distribution of free magnetism:

Magnetism: The manner in which magnetism is distributed. It was discovered by Coulomb that with saturated bars of more than seven inches in length, the distribution of magnetism could be expressed by a curve of which the abscissae formed the distance from the ends of the magnet, and the ordinates the force of magnetism at those points. (Ganot.)

(4) Distribution of plants:

Phyto-geography & Geol.: The diffusion of plants in space and in time. The former of these falls under phyto-geography; the latter may perhaps be ranked also under this department, but is more appropriately relegated to geology.

(a) Phyto-geography: The diffusion of plants in space—i. e., the manner in which plants are distributed in the several parts of the world. The species, genera, families, orders, &c., occurring in the several continents, islands, &c. Grisebach enumerates twenty-four regions of vegetation.

"The Arctic, the Europeo-Siberian Forest, the Mediterranean, the Steppes, the Chino-Japanese, the Indian Monsoon, the Sahara [in Central Africa, from 29° N. to 20° S.], and Southern Arabia, the Soudan, the Kalahari [extending along the Atlantic coast, from 20° to 23° S. lat.], the Cape, the Australian, the N. American Forest-Region, the Prairie, the Californian, the Mexican, the W. Indian, the Cis-equatorial Region of S. America, the Amazon, the Brazilian, the Tropical Andean, the Pampas, the Chilean Transition-Region, the Antarctic Forest-Region, and the Oceanic Islands.

Several of these regions, it will be observed, are nearly identical in climate with others; yet their vegetation pretty largely differs. This suggests that each species spread from a certain center in which it was first brought into being, and took time to spread from that center in the regions which it now occupies. There is also a bathymetrical distribution of plants, as of animals. It refers almost exclusively to the Algae. [¶] (1.)

(2) Geol.: The way in which plants are distributed, arranged, or grouped in time. Going back into antiquity, present species disappear; though modern genera remain, their orders, now extinct, appear; and, as a rule, the further back one goes the more different is the vegetation from that which now obtains. It is also, as a rule, not so high in organization, a progressive advance in that respect having taken place from the appearance of the first plant on the earth till now. For details, see the various articles on paleobotany.

(5) Distribution of heat:

Phys.: A term applied to designate the different ways in which a ray of heat, when it falls upon a liquid or solid body, is disposed of; as, by absorption, reflection, or transmission.

[¶] Statute of distribution:

Law: A statute regulating the mode of distribution of the personal estate of an intestate.

dis-trib-u-tion-al, a. [Eng. distribution; -al.] Pertaining to distribution.

"... the remains of a bird the whole of whose congeners are at present absolutely confined to the southern hemisphere, and therefore, in a broad sense, to the same great distributional area."—Huxley: Q. J. G. S., vol. xv. (1889), p. 675.

dis-trib-u-tion-ist, s. [Eng. distribution; -ist.] One employed in distribution, a distributor, a dispenser.

"The distributionists trembled, for their popularity was at stake."—Dickens: Sketches by Boz. (Davies.)

dis-trib-u-tiv-al, a. [Eng. distributive(e); -al.] Pertaining to a distributive, or distribution.

"... the distributive sense."—Key: Philological Essays (1868), p. 4.

dis-trib-u-tive, a. & s. [As if from a Lat. distributivus, from distributus, pa. par. of distribu=to distribute; Fr. distributif; Sp., Port., & Ital. distributivo.]

A. As adjective:I. Ordinary Language:

1. Of or pertaining to distribution; distributing, allotting, or dealing out to each its due share.

"The other species of justice called distributive, as consisting in the distribution of rewards and punishments."—South: Sermons, vol. iiii., ser. I.

2. Expressing or denoting distribution, division, or separation.

II. Technically:

1. Gram.: Expressing distribution, separation, or division. Distributive numerals are expressed by the use of the prep. by: as, By twos, two by two, &c. [DISTRIBUTIVE PRONOUN.]

2. Law: (For definition, see example.) [DISTRIBUTIVE FINDING.]

"Of human positive laws, some are distributive, some penal. Distributive are those that determine the rights of the subjects, declaring to every man what it is by which he acquireth and holdeth a property in lands or goods, and a right or liberty of action, and these speak all the subjects."—Hobbes: Of Commonwealth, pt. II., ch. xxvi.

3. Logic: Assigning the various species of a universal term.

[¶] Distributive finding of the issue:

Law: A finding by the jury partly in favor of the plaintiff and partly in favor of the defendant.

(2) Distributive pronoun:

Gram.: A pronoun which denotes that the member of a number to which it is applied is taken separately or disjunctively. Distributive pronouns are each, every, either, and neither.

B. As substantive:

Gram.: A word expressive of or denoting distribution or separation; a distributive pronoun, as each, &c.

dis-trib-u-tive-ly, adv. [Eng. distributive; -ly.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. By distribution.

2. Singly, particularly, one by one, not collectively.

"Distributively, at the least, all great and grievous actual offenses, one by one, both may and ought to be, by all means, avoided."—Hooker: Eccles. Polity, bk. v.

II. Logic: (See example.)

"An universal term is sometimes taken collectively for all its particular ideas united together; and sometimes distributively, meaning each of them single and alone."—Watts: Logic.

dis-trib-u-tive-ness, s. [Eng. distributive; -ness.] A propensity to or desire of distributing; generosity, open-handedness.

"The carving at the table he always made his province, which, he said, he did as a diversion to keep him from eating overmuch; but certainly that practice had another more immediate cause, a natural distributiveness of humor, and a desire to be employed in the relief of every kind of want of every person."—Fell: Life of Hammond, §2.

dis-trict, s. [Fr. from Low Lat. districtus=a district within which a lord may distrain, distringere potest (Ducange); distringo=to distrain (q. v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A circuit of authority, a province; the extent of territory under a certain authority or jurisdiction.

"Accepted by the several churches in their respective districts and dioceses."—Bp. Taylor: Dissuasive from Popery, bk. I., pt. II., §1.

2. A region, a tract of country, a territory, a province.

"The agricultural laborers of the neighboring districts."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

II. Law: The place in which a man hath the power of distraining, or the circuit or territory wherein one may be compelled to appear. (Blount.)

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between district, region, tract, quarter: "These terms are all applied to country: the former two comprehending divisions marked out on political grounds; the latter a geographical or an indefinite division: a district is smaller than a region; the former refers only to part of a country, the latter frequently applies to a whole country: a quarter is indefinite, and may be applied either to a quarter of the world or a particular neighborhood: a tract is the smallest portion of all, and comprehends frequently no more than what may fall within the compass of the eye. We consider the district only with relation to government: every magistrate acts within a certain district: we speak of a region when considering the circumstances of climate, or the natural properties which distinguish different parts of the earth, as the regions of heat and cold; we speak of the quarter simply to designate a point of the compass, as a person lives in a certain quarter of the town; that is, north or south, east or west, &c." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) district-attorney, s. The prosecuting officer of a district or district-court (q. v.).

district-court, s. A court having cognizance of cases arising within a certain defined district, more specifically as described below. The United States is divided into 66 districts for judicial purposes, each state in the Union containing at least one district, and some of them three. For each district there are a judge, a district-attorney, a marshal, and deputy marshals. They constitute the officers of the district-courts. These tribunals have charge of the initial administration of justice in cases of offense against the Federal Government, and form a link in the judicial succession that culminates in the Supreme Court of the United States, being as it were the Federal courts of common pleas.

district-judge, s. A judge of a United States district-court.

District of Columbia, s.

History: A subdivision of the territory of the United States, containing the national capital. Named for Columbus. Fixed as seat of U. S. Government 1790 by an act of Congress. Formed out of Washington County, Md. (64 square miles), a portion of Virginian territory offered the government being not now included. The United States Government removed to District in 1800. The city of Washington was captured by British, 1814, and capitol and executive mansion were burned. Governed by Congress till 1871, when a legislative body of 33 (11 appointed by the President and 22 elected) was created. This form of government was continued until 1878, when the government was invested in the present three commissioners, one of whom must be an army officer, and all of whom are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Congress makes all laws for the District. Citizens of District have no vote for national officers. Schools superior; the most notable educational institution being the Georgetown University (Christian Brothers), at Georgetown, a few miles from Washington. Surface made up of flats and hills. Similar in all features and products to Southern Maryland.

district-parish, s. A district or division of a parish marked out for ecclesiastical purposes. (Eng.)

district-school, s. A school for a certain defined district.

dis-trict', a. [Lat. districtus, pa. par. of distringo.] Rigorous, harsh, severe, stringent.

"Punishing with the rod of district severity."—Fox: Martyrs, p. 782.

dis-trict, v. t. [DISTRIC-T, s.] To divide or distribute into districts or limited divisions for purposes of administration, &c.

dis-tric-tion, s. [Latin districtio, from districtus (ensis)=a drawn (sword), pa. par. of distringo.] A sudden display; as, the glitter of a sword suddenly drawn.

"A smile . . . breaks out with the brightest distriction."—Collier: On the Aspect.

dis-trict-ly, *dis-trict-lie, adv. [Eng. district; -ly.] In a stringent, harsh, or rigorous manner; stringently, strictly.

"Districtlie and in virtue of obedience commanding you."—Fox: Martyrs, p. 218.

dis-trih'-gās, s. [Latin=you may distrain, 2d per sing. pr. subj. of distringo=to distrain (q. v.).] Law:

1. A writ issuing against a defendant who failed to attend; a distress infinite; a process commanding the sheriff to distrain the defendant from time to time, and continually afterward, by taking his goods and the profits of his lands.

2. A writ after judgment in detinue to compel the defendant to deliver the goods by repeated distresses of his chattels.

*3. A writ in the Court of Queen's Bench, commanding the sheriff to bring in the bodies of jurors who did not appear, or to distrain on their goods. (Eng.)

4. The process in courts of equity against a corporation refusing to obey the orders or summons of the court.

5. An order from the Court of Chancery, in favor of a party claiming to be interested in any stock standing in the books of the Bank of England, charging the authorities of the bank not to permit a transfer of such stock, nor to pay any dividend on it. (Eng.)

dis-trin-yie, v. t. [DISTRATN.]

dis-troub'-lance, *dis-trub-lance, s. [DISTRUBLE.] A disturbance.

"To cess of all distrubulance of the said Eufame in the joyning of the samyn in tyme to cum."—Act. Audit. A. 1486, p. 8.

Rather belongs, distrust, and all dispraise."
Milton: P. L., xi. 165, 166.

3. A suspicion as to the straightforwardness of the designs or intentions.

dis-trust'-əd, pa. par. or a. [DISTRUST, v.] dis-trust'-ēr, s. [Eng. distrust; -er.] One who distrusts.

dis-trust'-fūl, a. [Eng. distrust; -ful(l).]

1. Full of or inclined to distrust or suspicion; suspicious, mistrustful; wanting in confidence or faith.

"The breach of faith under Servilius and that under Valerius are then insisted on, as reasons for a distrustful policy."—Lewis: Cred. Early Rom. Hist. (1855), ch. xii., pt. 1, § 16.

2. Diffident, modest, without confidence.

"Distrustful sense with modest caution speaks;
But rattling nonsense in full volleys breaks."
Pope: Essay on Criticism, 625, 627.

3. It is followed by of before the thing distrusted.

"The great corruptors of discourse have not been so distrustful of themselves."—Government of the Tongue.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between distrustful, suspicious, and diffident: "Distrustful is said either of ourselves or others; suspicious is said only of others; diffident only of ourselves: to be distrustful of a person is to impute no good to him; to be suspicious of a person is to impute positive evil to him: he who is distrustful of another's honor or prudence will abstain from giving him his confidence; he who is suspicious of another's honesty will be cautious to have no dealings with him. Distrustful is a particular state of feeling; suspicious an habitual state of feeling: a person is distrustful of another owing to particular circumstances; he is suspicious from his natural temper. As applied to himself, a person is distrustful of his own powers to execute an office assigned, or he is generally of a diffident disposition: it is faulty to distrust that in which we ought to trust; there is nothing more criminal than a distrust in Providence; on the other hand, there is nothing better than a distrust in our own powers to withstand temptation: suspicion is justified more or less according to circumstances; but a too great proneness to suspicion is liable to lead us into many acts of injustice toward others: diffidence is becoming in youth, so long as it does not check their laudable exertions." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.) dis-trust'-fūl-lŷ, adv. [Eng. distrustful; -ly.] In a distrustful manner; with distrust or suspicion.

"The brother's eye
Doth search distrustfully the brother's face."
Hemans: Vespers of Palermo.

dis-trust'-fūl-nēss, s. [Eng. distrustful; -ness.] The quality or state of being distrustful or suspicious; want of confidence or reliance.

"Their diffidence and distrustfulness of others."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 82.

dis-trust'-īng, pr. par., a. & s. [DISTRUST, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The state of being distrustful; distrust, suspicion.

"Without unceasing distrustings, or refusing his prescriptions upon humor or impotent fear."—Bp. Taylor: Holy Dying, ch. iv., § 1.

dis-trust'-īng-lŷ, adv. [Eng. distrusting; -ly.] In a distrusting manner; distrustfully; with distrust.

dis-trust'-lēss, a. [Eng. distrust; -less.] Free from distrust or suspicion; trustful.

"Poets, ever void
Of guile, distrustless, scorn the treasured gold."
Shenstone: Economy.

dis-tū-ne, v. t. [Pref. dis, and Eng. tune (q. v.).] To put out of tune; to disturb.

"Untimely Fever, rude insulting guest,
How didst thou with such unharmonious heat Dare to disturb his well composed rest?"
Sir H. Wotton: To a Friend in Sickness.

dis-tūrb', des-torb', des-tourb', des-turb', des-turb'-ī, dis-tourb', dys-tourb', v. t. [Old Fr. destourber, desturber, from Lat. disturbo; dis=away, apart, and turbo=to disturb; turba=a crowd, a tumult; Ital. disturbare.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To throw into confusion or disorder.

2. To annoy, to discommodate, to put from a state of rest or quiet.

"Here, sir, I'd have beaten him like a dog, but for disturbing the lords within."—Shakesp. Coriolanus, iv. 5.

3. To discompose, to agitate, to render uneasy, to disquiet.

"The prince's fellow passengers had observed with admiration that neither peril nor mortification had for one moment disturbed his composure."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. ix.

4. To agitate, to excite, to cause excitement or disquiet in, to trouble.

"Preparing to disturb
With all-confounding war the realms above."
Cowper: Homer's Iliad, bk. xi.

5. To move or divert from any regular course.

"It oft-times may succeed, so as perhaps Shall grieve him, if I fail not; and disturb His inmost counsels from their destined aim."
Milton: P. L., i. 166-68.

6. To hinder, to interrupt, to molest.

7. To put out of possession. [II. 2.]

"He might know that he would not be disturbed for a certain number of years by the caprices of a landlord."—London Standard.

II. Law:

1. To alter, annul, or vary a verdict or decision.

2. To hinder or disquiet an owner in the regular and lawful enjoyment of some incorporeal hereditament. [DISTRURBANCE, II. 1.]

"The injury done to his property in disturbing him in his presentation."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iii., ch. 8.

¶ Crabb thus discriminates between disturb and interrupt: "We may be disturbed either inwardly or outwardly; we are interrupted only outwardly: our minds may be disturbed by disquieting reflections, or we may be disturbed in our rest or in our business by unseasonable noises; but we can be interrupted only in our business or pursuits: the disturbance therefore depends upon the character of the person: what disturbs one person will not disturb another; the interruption is, however, something positive: what interrupts one person will interrupt another: the smallest noises may disturb one who is in bad health; illness or the visits of friends will interrupt a person in his business. The same distinction exists between these words when applied to things as to persons: whatever is put out of its order or proper condition is disturbed: thus, water which is put into motion from a state of rest is disturbed; whatever is stopped in the evenness or regularity of its course is interrupted: thus, water which is turned out of its ordinary channel is interrupted." (Crabb: Eng. Synon.)

¶ For the difference between disturb and to trouble, see TROUBLE.

dis-tūrb', s. [DISTRURB, v.] Disturbance, tumult, confusion.

"Instant without disturb they took alarm,
And onward move embattled."
Milton: P. L., vi. 549, 550.

dis-tūrb'-ānce, des-tourb'-ance, des-torb'-ance, dis-turb'-ance, s. [Lat. disturbans, pr. par. of disturbo.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of disturbing or causing confusion, disorder, or disquiet; tumult.

"As for disturbance, I make none, being myself a man of peace."—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. i.

2. An interruption, derangement, or disordering of a regular state of things.

"None within the citee
In disturbance of vnities Durst ones meuen a matere."
Gower, iii. 181.

3. Emotion or disquiet of mind; perplexity, agitation, perturbation.

4. Confusion of thought.

"They can survey a variety of complicated ideas without fatigue or disturbance."—Watts: On the Mind.

5. A public agitation or excitement; tumult, riot, disorder.

"The bigan ther in this lond a newe destourbanse."
Robert of Gloucester, p. 614.

II. Technically:

1. Law: A wrong done to some incorporeal hereditament by hindering or disquieting the owners in their regular and lawful enjoyment of it.

2. Geol.: A violent throwing or moving from the original place or position.

dis-tūrb'-ān-čŷ, s. [DISTRURBANCE.]

"The author of the least disturbaney."—Daniel: To Sir T. Egerton.

dis-tūrb'-ant, a. [Lat. disturbans, pr. par. of disturbo.] Disturbing; causing disturbance; turbulent.

"Every man is a vast and spacious sea: his passions are the winds that swell him into disturbant waves."—Feltham: Resolves, 62.

dis-tūrb'-ā-tion, s. [Latin disturbatio, from disturbatus, pa. par. of disturbo.] A disturbance.

"By this way
All future disturbances would desist."
Daniel: Civil Wars, bk. iii.

dis-tūrb'-ed, des-tovrb'-ed, dys-tovrb'-ed, pa. par. or a. [DISTRURB, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb.)

B. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Thrown into confusion; stirred; excited, disquieted.

2. Geol.: Thrown or moved by some violent action from the original place or position.

dis-tūrb'-ēr, s. [Eng. disturb; -er.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. One who or that which disturbs or causes a disturbance; a disquieter or violator of peace, quiet, or calm.

"The devil, disturber of concord and sower of sedition."—Hall: Richard III. (an. 8).

2. One who or that which excites, agitates, or perturbs.

"Foes to my rest, and my sweet sleep's disturbers."
Shakesp.: Richard III., iv. 2.

II. Technically:

1. Law: One who hinders or disquiets another in the regular and lawful enjoyment of his right.

2. Eccles. Law: (For definition see extract.)

"Disturbers of a right of advowson may therefore be these three persons; the pseudo-patron, his clerk, and the ordinary: the pretended patron, by presenting to a church to which he has no right, and thereby making it litigious or disputable; the clerk, by demanding or obtaining institution, which tends to and promotes the same inconvenience; and the ordinary, by refusing to admit the real patron's clerk, or admitting the clerk of the pretender."—Blackstone: Commentaries, bk. iii., ch. 8.

¶ For the difference between disturbance and commotion, see COMMOTION.

dis-tūrb'-īng, pr. par., a. & s. [DISTRURB, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As subst.: The act of causing a disturbance.

"Your brains grow low, your bellies swell up high, Foul sluggish fat dite up your dulle eye."

More: Cupid's Conflict ('647).

dit-a, s. [A native word.]

Bot.: A tree of the Dogbane family (Apocynaceae). It is widely diffused throughout India and the Malayan Islands. It is a stiff-branched tree, attaining a height of 50 ft. to 80 ft., with a furrowed trunk; it has oblong leaves, 3 in. to 6 in. long, and 2 in. to 4 in. wide, produced in fours round the branches. The bark is intensely bitter, and is used by the natives in bowel complaints, and its milky juice as a kind of gutta-percha. It has recently been introduced into this country for use in medicine. (Smith.)

dita bark, s. The bark of Alstonia scholaris, which grows in the Philippines.

dit-a-mine, s. [Eng., &c., di(ta), and amine (q. v.).]

"Those eastern worshipers intended rather homage than ditation."—Hall: Contempl.; The Purification.

-ditch, dich, diche, dicche, dych, dyche, s. [A weakened pronunciation of dike (q. v.). Cf. pouch and poke, stitch and stick, pitch and pike.]

1. Ordinary Language:

1. A trench made in the earth by digging for the purpose of forming a fence or division between fields, or for drainage.

"Some asked for manors, others for acres that lay convenient for them; that he would pull down his fences, and level his ditches."—Arbuthnot: History of John Bull.

2. Used contemptuously for any petty or narrow stream.

"In the great plagues there were seen, in divers ditches and low grounds about London, many toads that had tails three inches long."—Racon.

*3. A dike, a moat.

"To fore the wal is the diche."—Trevisa, v. 45.

II. Technically:

1. Fort.: A trench or fosse on the outside of a fortification or earthwork, serving as an obstacle to the assailant and furnishing earth (deblai) for the parapet (remblai). It is from 90 ft. to 150 ft. broad, in regular fortifications, much narrower in mere earthworks or intrenched positions. The side of the ditch nearest the place is the scarp or escarp, and the opposite side, the counterscarp, is usually made circular opposite to the salient angles of the works. [BASTION.] The fossa around a Roman encampment was usually 9 ft. broad and 7 ft. deep; but if an attack was apprehended, it was made 13 ft. wide and 12 ft. deep. The agger, or parapet, of the encampment was raised from the earth to the fossa, and was crowned with a row of sharp stakes. The ditch outside the rampart on the western side of Rome was 100 ft. wide, 30 ft. deep. The work was constructed by Servius Tullius. (Knight.)

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; try, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā. qu = kw.

2. Agrie.: An artificial watercourse for drainage or irrigation. By the laws of Solon (594 B. C.), no one was allowed to dig a ditch but at the same distance from his neighbor's land that the ditch was deep. This was the same in the Roman laws of the twelve tables. The Grecian law compelled one who planted common trees to place them no nearer than 9 ft. from his boundary; olives, 10 feet. The Law of the Twelve Tables made it, olives and figs 9 ft., other trees 5 ft. The agricultural ditches of the Romans were open (fossae patentes) or closed (fossae caecae); the latter usually 3 ft. broad at top, 18 in. at bottom. The lower portion was filled with stone or gravel, a layer of pine leaves or willows, and then the earth replaced. Sometimes a large rope of withes or a bundle of poles was placed in the bottom. (Knight.)

† (1) Expedition of the Ditch, or of the Nations: Hist.: The third expedition of the Koreish, an Arab tribe, which had charge of the Caaba or sacred stone of Mecca, against Mahomet; and so named from the ditch drawn before the city. They were vanquished principally by the fury of the elements. (Gibbon, Haydn, &c.)

(2) To die in the last ditch: To resist to the uttermost; to hold out to the very last or to the bitter end.

ditching-machine, s. One adapted to excavate a deep trench and deposit the earth at the side of the same. In this sense a plow may be a ditching-machine, and in fact is often so used in running shallow ditches for surface-draining, but it will only make it single-furrow depth. There are many modifications of the plow for attaining extra depth. (Knight.)

ditching-plow, s. A plow having a deep, narrow share for cutting drains and trenches, and means for lifting the earth and depositing it at the side or sides of the excavation. The forward carriage straddles the ditch, and the rear supporting-wheel runs in the ditch behind the cutting and elevating mechanism. The share is supported by coulters, which cut the sides of the ditch, and deliver the furrow-slice to the guides upon which it rises, and to the moldboards which deliver it on the side of the ditch. Adjustments for varying depths are recited in the claims. (Knight.)

ditching-tools, s. pl. Spades of various shapes for different forms and depths of ditches: scoop-shaped for clearing out the bottoms; paring spades for removing the turf; level and reel-line for laying out the work; plows, ditching-machines, and excavators for reducing the amount of hand-work. (Knight.)

dite (1) dit-en, dyte, dyt-yn, v. t. [O. Fr. dicter, dicter, ditter; Sp. & Port. dictar; Ital. dittare, dettare, from Lat. dicto, a frequent form of dico=to say.]
